

MEDIOEVO

RIVISTA DI STORIA DELLA FILOSOFIA MEDIEVALE

MEDIOEVO

RIVISTA DI STORIA DELLA FILOSOFIA MEDIEVALE

XXXV

2010

Filosofia e teologia nel XII secolo
e nei primi decenni del XIII secolo

Philosophy and Theology in the 12th Century and in the first Decades of the 13th Century

a cura di
Riccardo Quinto

Direttore responsabile
RICCARDO QUINTO

Autorizzazione del Tribunale di Padova
n. 1755 del 7-8-2001

Tutti i diritti riservati - All rights reserved
Copyright © 2010 by Il Poligrafo - Padova
ISBN 978-88-7115-770-8
ISSN 0391-3566

Sono rigorosamente vietati la riproduzione, la traduzione, l'adattamento, anche parziale o per estratti, per qualsiasi uso e con qualsiasi mezzo elettronici, compresi la copia fotostatica, il microfilm, la memorizzazione elettronica ecc. senza la preventiva autorizzazione scritta della casa editrice Il Poligrafo.
Ogni abuso sarà perseguito a norma di legge.

I L P O L I G R A F O

Sede della Rivista
CENTRO INTERDIPARTIMENTALE
PER RICERCHE DI FILOSOFIA MEDIEVALE
UNIVERSITÀ DI PADOVA

Comitato scientifico

STEFANO CAROTI, MARTA CRISTIANI, GERHARD ENDRESS
GIANFRANCO FIORAVANTI, MARIATERESA FUMAGALLI
ALESSANDRO GHISALBERTI, TULLIO GREGORY
HENRI HUGONNARD-ROCHE, ALFONSO MAIERÙ, GREGORIO PALA
CESARE VASOLI, GRAZIELLA FEDERICI VESCOVINI

Direzione

FRANCESCO BOTTIN, ILARIO TOLOMIO

Redazione

GIOVANNI CATAPANO, CECILIA MARTINI, RICCARDO QUINTO

PAPERS SUBMITTED FOR PUBLICATION IN « MEDIOEVO » ARE SUBJECTED TO A DOUBLE BLIND PEER-REVIEW

In the European Reference Index for the Humanities (ERIH)
« Medioevo » is ranked in category B

I manoscritti vanno inviati alla Direzione della rivista presso il Centro Interdipartimentale per Ricerche di Filosofia Medievale 35139 Padova | piazza Capitanato 3
tel. 049 8274718, 8274716 - fax 049 8274701
e-mail: centro.medioevo@unipd.it

Abbonamento annuale:
per l'Italia: € 50,00
per l'estero: € 65,00

Richieste di abbonamento, di annate arretrate e ogni altra corrispondenza di carattere amministrativo vanno indirizzate a:
Il Poligrafo casa editrice srl
35121 Padova | piazza Eremitani - via Cassan, 34
tel. 049 8360887 - fax 049 8360864
e-mail: casaceditrice@poligrafo.it

SOMMARIO

RICCARDO QUINTO, Presentatione	7
FRANCESCO BOTTIN, Unibilitas. Back to the Source of the Soul's Unibility to the Body	9
MARCO RAININI, « Clarivis sub Conradus imperatore tertio », Corrado di Hirsau e le testimonianze di Johannes Trithemius: una riconsiderazione	37
CONSTANT J. MEWS-CLARE MOUNAGLE, Peter Lombard, Jodahin of Fiore, and the Fourth Lateran Council	81
MARK CLARK, Peter Comestor and Stephen Langton: Master and Student, and Co-Makers of the Historia scholastica	123
MAGDALENA BIENIAK-GIOVANNI PAOLO MAGGIORI- RICCARDO QUINTO, Le quaestiones di Stefano Langton sui doni dello Spirito Santo e sul sacrificio di Abramo	151
MASSIMILIANO D'ALESSANDRO, La quaestio di Stefano Langton su vita contemplativa et activa	257
IRENE ZAVATTERO, La definizione di philosophia moralis dell'anonimo «Comentum di Parigi» (1235-1240)	291
NOTE E DOCUMENTI
CATERINA TARLAZZI, Il manoscritto 469 della Biblioteca Teresiana di Mantova e Albero "di Clarnvax"	323
Ricordo di Louis-Jacques Bailillon OP (RICCARDO QUINTO)	341
Abstracts	347
Indice dei nomi	353
Indice dei manoscritti	359

PRESENTAZIONE

Il presente volume di « Medioevo » raccoglie il frutto di una serie di ricerche condotte nel corso degli ultimi anni nell'ambito del Centro Interdipartimentale per Ricerche di Filosofia Medievale dell'Università di Padova e del Seminario di Filosofia Medievale attivo all'interno della Scuola di Dottorato di Ricerca in Filosofia di Padova. Alcuni dei testi qui pubblicati sono versioni più ampie di relazioni presentate durante il seminario "La filosofia nel XII secolo" (tenuto nell'anno accademico 2007-2008): così gli articoli di Marco Raimi su Corrado di Hirsau e di Caterina Tartazzi su Alberico "di Clairvaux" testimoniano le fecondità di un approccio agli autori medievali che riserva una particolare attenzione alla loro fortuna storiografica e che sottoponga a una critica attenta non solo la tradizione manoscritta, ma anche la più antica diffusione a stampa dei loro testi. Altri saggi ruotano in relazione a un'attività didattica e di ricerca che prosegue con continuità da diversi anni, dedicata a "L'edizione critica dei testi medievali: filosofia e teologia": si offrono così al lettore le edizioni critiche di tre delle Quaestiones theologiae di Stefano Langton. I tre testi – editi da Magdalena Bieriaké, Massimiliano d'Allessandro, Giovanni Paolo Maggioni e Riccardo Quinto –, pur dedicati a testi dispersi (i doni dello Spirito Santo, il sacrificio di Abramo e il confronto tra vita attiva e contemplativa), sono studiati insieme allo scopo di evidenziare la loro relazione con dispute teologiche effettivamente celebrate nella scuola del Langton a Parigi. I due ampi saggi racconteranno così una serie di dati preziosi in vista dell'edizione complessiva dell'opera maggiore del Langton, che gli stessi studiosi stanno preparando per la serie degli Auctores Britannici Medii Aevi. A questa linea di ricerca si possono ricondurre anche gli interventi di Mark Clark, Constant Meus e Clare Monge: lo studio di Clare è direttamente legato all'edizione critica del commento del Langton alla Historia scholastica di Pietro Comestore, in preparazione per il Corpus Christianorum; quello di Meus e Monge offre invece un ampio affresco dei dibattiti dottrinali sviluppatisi a Parigi dopo la morte di Pier Lombardo (1160) e del loro riflesso sulle decisioni del Concilio Laterano IV (1215).

All'analisi della letteratura più strettamente filosofica che arricchisce il contesto parigino tra la fine del XII e l'inizio del XIII secolo sono dedicati i due saggi che incominciano il numero: Francesco Bottin indaga alcuni aspetti dell'antropologia avicenniana e della sua ricezione in ambito latino, mentre Irene Zavarero studia la definizione di filosofia morale in uno dei primi commenti latini all'Etica Nicomachea di Aristotele.

RICCARDO QUINTO

FRANCESCO BOTTIN

UNIBILITAS. BACK TO THE SOURCE OF THE SOUL'S UNIBILITY TO THE BODY

1. UNIBILITAS AND THEOLOGY OF THE PERSON

In the thirteenth century, the understanding of the soul-body relation was undoubtedly a highly controversial subject, and yet the leading thinkers of the time appear to agree on one aspect of this relation. Both Bonaventure and Thomas Aquinas, despite their deeply different anthropological conceptions, adopt a particular doctrine which had been progressively elaborated by theologians from the late twelfth century onwards,¹ thus endowing the concept of unibilitas with a special role in determining the relation between soul and body.

Bonaventure of Bagnoregio introduces the unibility concept in order to distinguish between angelic forms and human souls. According to him, both angelic forms and human souls are composed of a substantial form and a spiritual matter, hence they cannot be distinguished by this aspect. That which specifically differentiates

1. Cf. E. Gilson, History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages, Sheed and Ward, London, New York 1980, 360-362; B.C. Bazan, Pluralisme de formes ou dualisme de substances?, « Rev. philos. Louvain », 67 (1959), 30-73. Although in a climate of strong controversy between Dominican and Franciscan, the anonymous author of the Corruptioem corruptorum "Questione" pointed out the fundamental agreement between Aquinas and Bonaventure precisely on unibilitas: « Miror istam hominum inavolam insipientiam, cui invidia exacerat in dictis unitis doctores [Aquinas] reprobare non veretur id ipsum quod in dictis alterius laudant. Nam Bonaventura, quam laudant, id ipsum dicit quod hic calumniatur in Thoma » (cf. Le Corruptioem corruptorum "Questione", ed. J.-F. Müller, Kierles, Roma 1934 [Scuola Aristotelica, 35], 150).

ginum – and were able to prove that all of them were written by the same author. These conclusions agree with information provided by the German abbot Johannes Trithemius in several of his works from the late 15th and early 16th century, in which he maintains that the author of these texts was a certain Conrad, a monk at Hirsau writing around 1140. Trithemius is not usually considered to be a reliable historical source (partly with good reason, for some of his information is inaccurate and he sometimes refers to chronicles and authors of his own invention). Nevertheless, a careful examination of Conrad's works (and, among them, the Dialogus de oracis, a text only recently attributed to him), and other sources, proves that Trithemius's information on Conrad is reliable and suggests that Trithemius may have had access to the library of Hirsau before it was dispersed.

«Medioevo», 35 (2010), 37-80.

CONSTANT MEWS

Monash University, Melbourne
constantmews@monash.edu

CLARE MONAGLE

Monash University, Melbourne
clare.monagle@arts.monash.edu.au

Peter Lombard, Joachim of Fiore, and the Fourth Lateran Council

This paper examines the intellectual and religious debates involved in the action of the Fourth Lateran Council in condemning the criticism made by Joachim of Fiore of Peter Lombard's understanding of the Trinity. The authors argue that this condemnation, of decisive influence in shaping the direction of scholastic theology in the 13th century, marks the victory of one particular school of thought being developed in Paris in the second half of the 12th century, that of Peter Lombard, as well of his particular way of understanding God as summa quaedam res, conceptually distinct from the three divine persons, even if they shared in the same divine nature. While Lombard was inspired by a phrase of Augustine's De doctrina Christiana, he subtly rephrased Augustine's argument in a way that was seen by Richard of St. Victor as creating unnecessary separation between the divine persons and the dynamic nature of God as love that flowed into the divine persons. The authors argue that Joachim's objection to Lombard's analysis was inspired by Richard of St. Victor's own critique of Lombard's understanding of the Trinity, distinct from and perhaps more cogent than the accusations made about Lombard's Christology by his critics, many of whom were connected in some way to St. Victor. The official support given to Peter Lombard at Lateran IV was intimately connected to the desire of Innocent III and his senior advisers to create an unchallenged foundation for theological orthodoxy at the newly established University of Paris.

«Medioevo», 35 (2010), 81-122.

MARK CLARK

Christendom College, Front Royal, VA, USA
cometor@gmail.com

Peter Cornetor and Stephen Langton: Master and Student, and Co-Masters of the Historia scholastica

In the article the chronology of Stephen Langton's career as a theologian in Paris is revisited, and the author argues that the newly-established timeframe makes it likely that Langton was in fact Peter Cornetor's student. Moreover, on the basis of information provided by Langton in his commentaries on the Historia scholastica, he argues that Langton and Cornetor worked together on the Historia scholastica and that Langton is the key to understanding the early textual history of that work.

«Medioevo», 35 (2010), 123-150.

MAGDALENA BIENIAK

Institute of Philosophy, University of Warsaw magdalenabieniak@ibp.uw.edu.pl

GIOVANNI PAOLO MAGGIONI

Università del Molise gpmaggioni@unimol.it

RICCARDO QUINTO

Università degli Studi di Padova riccardo.quinto@unipd.it

Le quaestiones di Stefano Langton sui doni dello Spirito Santo e sul sacrificio di Abramo
The paper takes the edition of two of Stephen Langton's Quaestiones theologice as an opportunity to provide a summary of our knowledge of the manuscript transmission of this work. The two edited quaestiones, though not ideologically linked to each other, belong to a special group of eight quaestiones which are present in the same order in all four different collections that preserve Langton's 200 theological quaestiones. Through a detailed philological analysis, the authors argue that a) the four sub-archetypes of the quaestiones (two preserved, and two lost after having been copied) all copied directly one and the same ar-

CONSTANT J. MEWS - CLARE MONAGLE
 PETER LOMBARD, JOACHIM OF FIORE
 AND THE FOURTH LATERAN COUNCIL

The publication in 1994 of Peter Lombard, Marcia Colish's magisterial study of the author of the Sentences, as well as of Philipp Rosemann's more compact monograph on the same subject ten years later, has inspired a new wave of interest in this most important of twelfth-century thinkers. Taken as a whole, this revival of interest in Peter Lombard (d. 1160) opens a new window upon his achievement.¹ In terms of the canon of twelfth-century thinkers, Peter Lombard has often suffered in comparison to the flashier and more obviously original Peter Abelard (1079-1142). Where Abelard has been seen as an innovator, Peter Lombard has tended to be considered as a master compiler. But new research is conveying a much more complicated perspective, one that is sensitive

1. Peter Lombard, Sententiae in IV libris distinctas, ed. I. Brady, Editiones Collegii S. Bonaventurae ad Claras Aquas, Graecaeclatinala 1975-1981 (Spicilegium Bonaventuriano-nu., 4-5); Peter Lombard, The Sentences: Book 1 The Mystery of the Trinity, trans. G. Sliano, Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, Toronto 2007; Book 2: On Creation and Book 3: On the Incarnation of the Word were published in the same series in 2008; Book 4 has still to appear. See also M. Colish, Peter Lombard, 2 vols, Brill, Leiden 1994; P. Rosemann, Peter Lombard, Oxford University Press, New York 2004 and P. Rosemann, The Story of a Great Medieval Book, University of Toronto Press, Toronto 2007, and Peter Lombard: Atti del XLIII Congresso storico internazionale, Todi, 8-10 ottobre 2006, Fondazione Centro Italiano di Studi sull'Alto Medioevo, Spoleto 2007. We are indebted to Sylvain Piron, Dominique Poirel, and Gian-Luca Peticola for comments on earlier versions of this paper, as well as to colleagues from the School of Historical Studies, Maastricht University.

to the very subtle and very precise theological innovations of Lombard. An increasingly nuanced picture is being drawn of the Sentences and the manifest ways in which this work transformed the practice of theology in the latter part of the twelfth century.

In this article, we join this chorus of interest in Peter Lombard's legacy, but do so by focusing on the controversial character of his discussion of the Trinity. One of the strongest indicators of the importance accorded to the Sentences by ecclesiastical authority can be found in the statutes of the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215. There, Peter Lombard's Trinitarian theology was proclaimed as orthodox by the Council while the criticisms of it made by Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202) were rejected. Such endorsement of a particular schoolman was unprecedented and goes some way to demonstrate the impact of the Sentences upon the schools and the papacy. This article seeks to unpack this official approval, placing it in the context of the intellectual activity of the schools in the previous fifty years, in particular since the Third Lateran Council of 1179. In so doing, we hope to gain greater understanding of the popularity and impact of the Book of Sentences so as to explain why and how it was so fundamental to the intellectual culture of the high middle ages.

LATERAN IV

The endorsement of Peter Lombard at the Fourth Lateran Council of 1215 was bold and decisive. In a major break with established tradition, Pope Innocent III promulgated the Council's declaration of Christian orthodoxy with a vigorous refutation of allegations that had been made by abbot Joachim of Fiore that Lombard's Trinitarian theology – or at least a particular passage near the beginning of the Sentences (I, d. 5, c. 1) – was heretical, positing a quaternity instead of a Trinity:

We therefore condemn and reprove that small book or treatise which abbot Joachim published against master Peter Lombard concerning the unity or essence of the Trinity, in which he calls Peter Lombard a heretic and a madman because he said in his Sentences: «For there is a certain supreme thing (res) which is the Father and the Son and the holy Spirit, and it neither begets nor is begotten, nor does it proceed». He asserts from this that

Peter Lombard ascribes to God not so much a Trinity as a quaternity, that is to say three persons and a common essence, as if this were a fourth. Abbot Joachim clearly protests that there does not exist any thing (res) which is the Father and the Son and the holy Spirit – neither an essence nor a substance nor a nature – although he concedes that the Father and the Son and the holy Spirit are one essence, one substance, and one nature.²

After quoting at some length from Joachim to argue that it was the abbot rather than Lombard who was denying that the Trinity constituted a supreme thing (res), the Pope then declared orthodox faith cum Petro – subtly connecting the author of the Sentences with the first of the apostles. The Pope or his theological adviser then went on to offer a definition of orthodox faith, silently correcting the phrase quoted inaccurately by Joachim (quaedam summa res) from Lombard's Sentences, with a more accurate version, adding the term «one» (una quaedam summa res).

We, however, with the approval of this sacred and universal Council, believe and confess with Peter that there exists a certain one supreme thing (res), incomprehensible and ineffable, which truly is the Father and the Son and the holy Spirit, the three persons together and each one of them separately. Therefore in God there is only a Trinity, not a quaternity, since each of the three persons is that thing – that is to say substance, essence or divine nature – which alone is the principle of all things, besides which no other principle can be found.³

2. Conditio Oecumenicorum Decretis, ed. J. Alberigo, J.A. Dossati, P.P. Joannou, C. Leonardi, E. Prodi, Fl. Jedin, Istituto per le scienze religiose di Bologna, Bologna 1973, 230-271, especially 235-232, reprinted with the same pagination in: an English translation, Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils, ed. Norman J. Tanner, Sheed & Ward, London 1990: «Damianus ergo et reprobandus libellum sive tractatum quem abbas Joachim edidit contra magistrum Petrum Lombardum de unitate seu essentia trinitatis appellans ipsam haereticum et existens pro eo quod in suis dixit sententiis quoniam quaedam summa res est pater et filius et spiritus sanctus et illa non est generans neque genita nec procedens unde asserit quod ille non tam trinitatem quam unitatem acutius in deo videlicet tres personas et illam communem essentiam quasi quatuor manifeste protestans quod nulla res est quae sit pater et filius et spiritus sanctus nec est essentia nec substantia nec natura quatuor concordet quod pater et filius et spiritus sanctus sunt: una essentia una substantia unaque natura».

3. Conditio Oecumenicorum Decretis, 232, in the Tanner translation, cum Petro is rendered as "with Peter Lombard": «Nos autem sacro et universali concilio ap-

Translating res in English as "reality" perhaps conveys more fluently than "thing" a notion that for Peter Lombard was unexceptional, but seemed highly contentious to Joachim. The Pope, speaking through the Council, used the opportunity to counter Joachim's critique of Lombard with a definition of orthodox Christian belief. He then went on to condemn various other heresies and malpractices in the Church, but without any of the detail accorded the challenge to Lombard's authority by Joachim. Nothing could be more serious than to challenge the Christian doctrine of the Trinity and unity of God.

Lateran IV is rightly considered a watershed Council, bringing about a new era of papal oversight and organisation. This endorsement of Peter Lombard must be understood as occurring in the context of one of the most activist councils in history. It put forward a bold reform agenda. A crusade was preached, clerical participation in ordeals was banished and the notion of transubstantiation was used officially for the first time.⁴ It prohibited the establishment of any new religious orders beyond those that had already been approved. And as well, of course, there is its defence of Peter Lombard, seeming to mark a decisive victory for scholastic theology over that of the monasteries, with a scholaman from northern Italy, who had made his career in Paris, being acclaimed at the expense of a Calabrian monk who had never been to France.

Certainly, an initial glance at the language of the constitutions of Lateran IV might suggest this adversarial reading. A closer reading of the debates around Peter Lombard's orthodoxy before 1215 suggests, however, a more complicated set of positions emanating from the Council. Peter Lombard's reputation up until Lateran IV was in fact highly contested both within and outside of the schools. Considerable attention has been given to the debate provoked by his Christology in the second half of the twelfth century.⁵ These criticisms focused upon Book 3 of the Sentences, where Peter Lombard had determined to clarify the terms of the hypostatic union, thereby resolving certain patristic contractions in this regard. Throughout the 1170s, two Augustinian canons, John of Cornwall (d. c. 1200), a former student of Peter Lombard, and Walter, subprior (1162-73) and then prior of St-Victor until his death (c. 1180-90), construed him as effectively another Abelard, misusing dialectical sophistry to distort Christian belief.⁶ While disagreement with Peter Lombard is often presented as the product of arch-conservatives being unwilling to adapt to the demands of scholastic debate, we shall argue that important criticism of his theology was also made by two much more analytic thinkers associated with St-Victor, namely Achard (d. 1170), abbot of St-Victor from 1155 to 1161, and Richard of St-Victor, its prior from 1162 until his death in 1173. They constructed a vein of critique not just of Lombard's Christology, but also of his theology of the Trinity. While Peter Lombard himself drew on themes developed by Hugh of St-Victor during the 1130s, he combined these insights with a style of argumentation from conflicting authorities established by Peter Abelard. Certain canons of St-Victor would view Lombard as betraying the legacy established by Hugh. Joachim of Fiore extended this current of suspicion towards Lombard's achievement. The endorsement in Peter at Lateran IV represents not merely a blanket endorsement of the schools, but a particular intervention into a long-standing argument between these critics and loyal disciples of Peter Lombard, many of whom had been trained at the cathedral school of Notre Dame.

5. See most recently, Pietro B. Rossi, Contro Lombardum: razioni alla cristologia di Pietro Lombardo, in Pietro Lombardo (n. 1 above), 123-191.

6. See John of Cornwall, Enalogium ed. N. Haring, The Enalogium ad Alexandrum Papam scriptum of John of Cornwall, Med. Stud. 3, 13 (1952), 253-300; P. Glorieux, Le Contre Joachim laprêtre des Français de Gauthier de Saint-Victor, Arch. Hist. Doctr. Litt. M. A. 3, 19 (1952), 187-355.

probathe credimus et confitemur cum Petro quod una quaedam summa res est incomprehensibilis quidem et ineffabilis quae veraciter est pater et filius et spiritus sanctus, tres simul personae ac sigillatim quaelibet eundem et ideo in deo trinitas est solummodo non quaternitas, quia quaelibet trinum personarum est illa res videlicet substantia essentia sive natura divina quae sola est universorum principium praeeter quod aliud inventum non potest...⁷

4. Cf. J. Goering, The invention of transubstantiation, Traditio, 46 (1991), 147-170.

Taken together, we argue, these criticisms made against Peter Lombard's Trinitarian theology registered a particular concern with the practice of referring to abstract theological notions without a concrete or spiritual reality (res) in themselves. Peter Lombard's critics were suspicious of any reflection on the divine essence that seemed to diminish its divine nature within the three persons, or the reality (res) of Christ as Son of God. The criticisms they made of Lombard's Christological and Trinitarian thought reflected genuine fear that speaking through abstract theological notions undermined the dynamic reality central to the incarnation and the Trinity. Joachim's criticisms of Peter Lombard's Trinitarian theology deserve, therefore, to be taken seriously. The Lateran Council nonetheless endorsed the fundamental orthodoxy of Lombard's articulation of the Trinitarian essence as a reality (una quaedam summa res) conceptually distinct from the divine persons against his critics. How did the Council get to this point of intervention? In order to answer this question, it is necessary to retrace the origins and trajectories of the Sentences and its author, as well as the inspiration behind Lombard's particular definition of supreme reality.

PETER LOMBARD, AUGUSTINE AND ABELARD

Peter Lombard is not known to have studied secular philosophy in Paris. All we know is that he came from Novara in Lombardy to study in France, initially at Reims under Alberic (d. 1141), who taught there from 1121 to 1136.⁷ Reims may have had a particular connection to Lombard through Alberic's colleague, Loup of Novara, a fellow-disciple of Anselm of Laon (d. 1117). Under Alberic, its cathedral school had become well-known as a place where teaching focused not on secular philosophy, but on scripture and orthodox doctrine.⁸ Peter Lombard came to Paris in

7. Lombard's connection to Novara is reported in the rubric of an early copy of the Sentences, Munich, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek, Clm 18109 (Brady, vol. 1, no. 7).

8. Hugh Primas, Carmen 18, The Oxford Poems of Hugh Primas and the Abundant Lyrics, ed. C.J. McDonough, Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, Toronto 1984.

around 1134, armed with a letter from Bernard of Clairvaux to the abbot of St-Victor commending him as a virum venerabilem, whom Bernard had helped support at Reims at the request of the bishop of Lucca. In transferring from Reims to Paris, he was moving from an ancient cathedral school that took pride in its tradition, to an emerging urban centre with a multiplicity of schools, and increasing interest in the study of secular philosophy.⁹ Peter Abelard, who had himself tangled with Alberic of Reims and Loup in theological controversy at the Council of Soissons in 1121, was then the dominant teacher at Sainte-Geneviève, while Hugh was the leading figure at St-Victor. We do not know how long Peter Lombard studied under Hugh of St-Victor before moving to Notre-Dame. By around 1142, however, he was already reported to be a celebrated theologian, at least according to the author of the Metamorphosis Goliath, written soon after the death of Peter Abelard.¹⁰ It seems likely that he had already started teaching at (Toronto Medieval Latin Texts), 62-63: «Remis enim per earem / Primatus tenet dignitatem. / Set, quod habet ad artiquo, Nunc augetur sub Albino. / Per hunc Remis utis supremus, / Per hunc portat diadema. Non leguntur hic poete, / Set Iohannes et prophete. / Non est scola uariata, / Set doctrina uentata. / Ibi nomen non secretis, / Set eterne trinitatis». Hugh, writing somewhere before 1166, also mentions another Lombard as a member of his school, as well as a certain Oto, all living there as holy hermits: «Et cum eo Adelardus / Valde dicitur Langobardus / Generosus pater Oto / Et quam plures pari uoto / Hic aggressi uiam uite / Sacri degunt heremitae».

9. Bernard of Clairvaux, Epistola 410, in Sacra Bernardi Opera, vol. VIII, ed. J. Leclercq and C. H. Talbot, Editiones Cistercienses, Rome 1977, 391.

10. Metamorphosis Goliath 90, ed. R. B. C. Huygens, CCM 171A, Brepols, Turnhout 2000, 805-815, esp. 813: «Celestem theologum vidimus Lombardum, / cum Yvone Helian Petrum et Bernardum, / eorum copulatum spiras os et nardum, / et protesti plumbi sunt Abelardum». Huygens first published this text as Die Metamorphose des Goliath, «Studi Medievali», IIIA ser., 3 (1962), 764-772. Wim Verbeke has argued that the poem refers to Abelard, whose absence is alluded to in the poem, as still alive and that he must therefore have died in 1143, not 1142 as most chorides attest, in The Council of Sens reconsidered: masters, monks, or judges?, «Church History», 74 (2005), 460-494, n. 64, picking up a suggestion originally made by J. E. Benton, Philology's Search for Abelard in the Metamorphosis Goliath, originally published in «Speculum», 50 (1975), 199-217, reprinted in J. E. Benton, Chiliter, Power and Personality in Medieval France, ed. T. N. Bisson, The Hambleton Press, London 1991, 435-474. Yet Abelard's absence coupled with the allusion to Gilbert as «Et hic pre-ticular the De doctrina Christiana –, might suggest that he was simply a traditionalist in his perspective. Yet, as we shall see, Peter Lombard's rendering of the Trinity in the Sentences was no mere rehashing of Augustine. In fact, while loyal to broad themes of Augustine, Peter Lombard did not hesitate to recast with great subtlety certain opinions of the Bishop of Hippo. This recasting was not uninfluenced by his awareness of the arguments of Abelard.

Lombard opened his Sentences by discussing the semantic principles that Augustine had raised in the De doctrina Christiana about the distinction between signa and res: «All teaching concerns things or signs. With diligent investigation, we have pondered over and over again the contents of the Old and New Law; by God's preventient grace, it has become clear to us that the study of the sacred page is principally concerned with things or with signs».¹⁶ As if aware of the potential problems created for theology by Abelard's application of an Aristotelian vox-res antithesis to the Trinity, Lombard turned to Augustine for an alternative semantic theory. Lombard then moved to draw on Augustine's discussion in the De doctrina Christiana about the distinction between those realities which are to be used and those which are to be enjoyed. Although Augustine was not particularly concerned in that treatise with the Trinity, Peter Lombard seized on a passage about the divine essence as «a certain one supreme thing» (una quaedam summa res) to develop his argument. Initially, Lombard quoted this definition precisely: «The things therefore which are to be enjoyed, the Father, and Son and Holy Spirit, and the same Trinity, are one certain supreme thing, common to all who enjoy it; if indeed it is a thing, and not the cause of all things, if indeed it is the cause».¹⁷ He quoted this and other passages from the De doctrina

Christiania to support the distinction he wished to draw between use and true enjoyment (as distinct from simply using something or someone for personal delight) – in particular of the ultimate object of true enjoyment, namely God himself.

Yet, when Lombard turned to the philosophically contested question of the relationship between supreme reality and the terms Father, Son and Holy Spirit, he made an assertion that would strike Joachim of Fiore as outrageous: «In the same way it is not to be asserted that the divine essence generated the Son because, since the Son is the divine essence, the Son would already be the thing from which he is generated; and so the same thing would generate itself. And so also we say that the divine essence did not generate an essence. Since the divine essence is a one and supreme certain thing [reality], if the divine essence generated an essence, then the same thing generated itself, which is not at all possible. But the Father alone begot the Son, and the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son».¹⁸ Peter Lombard was emphasising a conceptual distinction between the supreme divine essence and the three persons, namely Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

Joachim, as reported by the Council, had misquoted Peter Lombard by leaving out the crucial una et from Lombard's phrase, una et summa quaedam res, so as to reinforce the impression that Lombard was creating a fourth entity, apart from the three divine persons. The critical edition of this passage in the Sentences does not identify that Lombard was here paraphrasing Augustine's deed. M. Simoretti, Sant'Agostino, L'Esposizione ordinata, Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, Mondadori, Milan 1994, 22-24: «res igitur, quibus fruendum est, pater et filius et spiritus sanctus eademque trinitas, una quaedam summa res communisque omnibus fruendus ea, si tamen res et non rerum omnium causa, si tamen et causa». Quoted by Lombard, Sent. I, d. 1, c. 2 no. 4, ed. Brady, vol. I, 56; trans. Silano, vol. I, 5; also Sent. I, d. 25, c. 2, no. 5, ed. Brady, vol. I, 194; trans. Silano, vol. I, 137.

16. Peter Lombard, Sententiae I, d. 1, c. 1, ed. Brady, vol. I, 55 (trans. Silano, vol. I, 5), quoting De doctrina Christiana I, 2: «Omnis doctrina de rebus vel de signis. Verbis ac novae Legis continentiam diligenter indigne etiam atque etiam considerantibus nobis praevia Dei gratia innocuit sacrae paginae tractatum circa res vel signa praecipue versari».

17. Augustine, De doctrina Christiana I, 5, ed. J. Martin, CCL 32, Brepols, Turnhout 1962, 9, ed. W.M. Green, CSEL 80, Holder-Pichler-Tempsky, Vienna 1963, 10:

ed. M. Simoretti, Sant'Agostino, L'Esposizione ordinata, Fondazione Lorenzo Valla, Mondadori, Milan 1994, 22-24: «res igitur, quibus fruendum est, pater et filius et spiritus sanctus eademque trinitas, una quaedam summa res communisque omnibus fruendus ea, si tamen res et non rerum omnium causa, si tamen et causa». Quoted by Lombard, Sent. I, d. 1, c. 2 no. 4, ed. Brady, vol. I, 56; trans. Silano, vol. I, 5; also Sent. I, d. 25, c. 2, no. 5, ed. Brady, vol. I, 194; trans. Silano, vol. I, 137.

18. Sent. I, d. 5, c. 1, no. 6, ed. Brady, vol. I, 32: «Ita etiam non est dicendum quod divina essentia genuit filium: Quia cum filius sit divina essentia, iam esset filius res a qua generatur, et ita eadem res se ipsam generaret. Ita etiam dicimus quod essentia divina non genuit essentiam: Cum enim una et summa quaedam res sit divina essentia, si divina essentia essentiam genuit, eadem res se ipsam genuit, quod omnino esse non potest: sed pater solus genuit filium, et a patre et filio procedit spiritus sanctus». Trans. Silano, vol. I, 31-32.

inition in the De doctrina Christiana about una summa quaedam res that he had quoted earlier, but with a very significant modification.¹⁹ In fact, Lombard had silently paraphrased Augustine's description of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit as three separate things, so as to reserve res uniquely for a single supreme divine essence, but not applying it to the relative terms Father and Son. Augustine had employed a traditional semantic theory, Stoic in origin, by which all words were signs of things (res), and had not been particularly troubled by referring to the individual divine persons as plural things or realities, when this might seem to challenge the notion of a single underlying divine essence. Lombard's subtle rephrasing of Augustine's comment suggests that he was very aware of the theological difficulty of Augustine having referred to both three persons as three things, and the divine essence as a thing. Lombard silently modified Augustine's definition in the De doctrina Christiana so as to distinguish the reality that was the divine essence from Father, Son, and Holy Spirit as relative terms that could not be identified with each other and were conceptually distinct from divine essence. This was a theological move of profound significance for the subsequent development of Trinitarian theology, so much of which would be built upon Peter Lombard's discussion in the Sentences.

Peter Lombard justified this crucial distinction by referring back to exactly the same passage at the opening of Augustine's De trinitate that Peter Abelard, years earlier, had himself quoted against Albinus of Reims, Lombard's own teacher. Abelard wanted to refute the claim that in his Theologia he was denying that God could beget God: «As for those who think that it is in God's power to generate himself, they err... For there is no reality at all which generates itself into existence».²⁰ While it is unlikely that he had read Abelard's account of this disputation in the Historia Calamitatum, Lombard certainly would have known Abelard's refutation of Albinus from the Theologia Scholarium, a treatise originally directed against Roscelin of Compiègne's argument that each divine person had to signify a distinct reality (res) that could not be identified with each other.²¹ Abelard's method, in philosophy as in theology, has been well described by Jean Jolivet as involving a process of derivation – a desire to separate language from the specific things that it might seem to signify.²² Like Abelard, Peter Lombard focused attention on the terminology of Christian doctrine, and thus applied a similar methodology, even if the specific conclusions he reached were quite different.²³ For all his debt to Augustinian semantics, Peter Lombard subtly invoked a similar process to that of Abelard in refusing to describe the divine persons as separate realities. On the issue of whether divine essence could generate divine essence, Peter Lombard was in accord with Peter Abelard. To the question (Sent. I, d. 4, c. 1) «whether the Father generated a divine essence, or whether an essence generated the Son, or an essence generated an essence, or whether it neither generated nor was generated» his answer was firm: «neither did the Father generate a divine essence, nor did a divine essence generate the Son, nor did a divine essence generate an essence».²⁴ Lombard recognised that one had to distin-tura. Nulla enim omnino res est quae se ipsam generat ut sit». Quoted in Sent. I, d. 4, c. 1, ed. Brady, vol. 1, 77-78; trans. Silano, I, 27; Abelard, Historia calamitatum, ed. J. Monfrin, Vrin, Paris 1978, 84-85.

21. Abelard, Theologia Scholarium, II, 64 and 146, ed. E.-M. Buytaert and C.J. Meus, CCM 13, Brepols, Turnhout 1987, 440, 479; also quoted by Abelard Sic et Non 15, 1, ed. B.B. Boyer and R. McKeon, University of Chicago Press, Chicago 1977, 145; Theologia Summi boni II, 62, ed. Buytaert-Meus, CCM 13, 134; Theologia Christiana III, 109, ed. Buytaert, CCM 12, Brepols, Turnhout 1969, 215.

22. Jean Jolivet, Œtre de langage et théologie chez Abelard, Vrin, Paris 1969.

23. Alessandro Ghisalberti comments helpfully on Lombard's broad debt in this respect to Abelard's theological methodology, in Lezioni e inquisito veritas. Pietro Lombardo e l'evoluzione della teologia nel secolo XII, in Pietro Lombardo (n. 1 above), 1-22, esp. 14-17. By contrast, John Wertenbach (Peter Abelard and Peter the Lombard, in Pietro Lombardo, 225-239) emphasizes Lombard's failure to understand specifically philosophical themes in Abelard.

24. Sent. I, d. 5, c. 1, ed. Brady, vol. 1, 80-81. «Post haec quatuor utrum concedendum sit quod pater generat divinam essentiam, ut, quod divina essentia generat

19. See above n. 17. Peter Lombard modified Augustine's text slightly, by changing una quaedam summa res to una et summa quaedam res; no variants to this phrase are recorded in the critical editions of either Augustine or Peter Lombard at this point.

20. Augustine, De trinitate, I, 1, ed. W.J. Mountain, CCL 50, Brepols, Turnhout 1968, 78: «qui autem putant eum esse potentiae eum ut seipsum ipse genuerit, ceptus errant quod non solum deus ita non est sed nec spiritalis nec corporalis creaguish the relative terms Father, Son and Holy Spirit, from the underlying reality they signified. Unsurprisingly, not everyone agreed with him in making this distinction.

The passage in Augustine's De doctrina Christiana about the three divine persons as distinct realities (plural res), but as also constituting a supreme reality, was one that Roscelin of Compiègne had himself used, while Abelard would in turn quote it in his Theologia Christiana and Sic et Non.²⁵ In the Sentences Lombard quoted the passages of Augustine about one reality as unable to beget another reality, and about divine essence as a certain one supreme reality in exactly the same sequence as Abelard in the Sic et Non, suggesting that his reading of the Fathers had been powerfully shaped by Abelard's selection of pivotal patristic texts.²⁶ There was also an exceptionally close textual relationship between the quotation of patristic texts in Lombard's Sentences and in the Theologia Scholarium, confirming the comment made by John of Cornwall that Peter Lombard always had Abelard's Theologia to hand.²⁷

PETER LOMBARD'S TEACHERS AND CONTEMPORARIES

Lombard's careful distinction between the divine essence and the three divine persons suggests that on this particular issue, he shared Abelard's disagreement with Alberic of Reims, but does so without any sense of polemic. While Lombard clearly admired the theological vision of Hugh of St-Victor, he sought to extend it with the more precise armature of patristic learning and reasoned discussion, in the fashion of the school of Laon and more critically of Abelard himself. In this way he could continue within the tradition established by Anselm of Laon and Alberic of Reims, but subtly absorbing from Abelard the importance of critical examination of patristic authority without giving overt attention to that of philosophical reason.

In doing so, Lombard was continuing a precedent already established in the Summa sententiarum, a succinct compendium of Hugh's teaching supplemented with significant patristic authorities as expounded by Anselm of Laon, but without Hugh's elegant literary style.²⁸ That another Italian, Otto of Lucca, was its author is confirmed by an unpublished Introductio theologie which includes two extracts from the Summa sententiarum introduced initially as "from the sentences of master Anselm and master Hugh," and then as "from the treatise of master Otino according to master Anselm and master Hugh."²⁹ These rubrics are of great value be-

28. Summa sententiarum, PL 176, 4^a-174 and (under the name of Hilbert of Lavarin) PL 171, 1075-1150; Luscombe notes how it regularly criticises ideas of Abelard (The School of Peter Abelard, Cambridge: University Press, Cambridge 1969, 108-213).

29. The Introductio theologie occurs in two manuscripts: (B: Evreux, Bibl. Mun. 19, ff. 137^v-145^r and R: Rouen, Bibl. Mun. 553, ff. 134^r-137^v). After a preface, it begins with excerpts from a sermon of Bernard of Clairvaux and from Peter Abelard's Cantem ad Abelardum, followed by excerpts from various authors, both patristic and modern: (B 138^r R 134^r) "Ex sententiis magistorum eiusdem et hilgonis." Melius enim est non eloqui magna, ubi sine periculo non erratur, quam dicere contraria. Sed ubique posuimus auctoritatem vestigia imitemur, ut sint uera nostra auctoritas. Vbi uero deest auctoritas, hanc potissimum assensum studentibus, qui maxime interpretantur (= Summa sententiarum, Praefatio, PL 176, 41) (B 142^r R 136^v) "Ex tractatu magistri alonis iuxta magistram arseleum et hilgonis hilgonem." Ratio approbat deum esse, et in unum esse, in principium omnium unum, asserit et finis. Si duo essent, uel utrumque iustificans esset, uel alterum superfluum, quia si aliquid deesset alicui quod haberet aliud, non esset summe perfectum. Si uero in nichil deesset quod haberet aliud, cura in uno omnia, alterum superfluum. Est ergo unum principium, unus auctor omnium, igitur esse deum ratione caret, nisi contrarium esse, effigiale natus, materiale lapis. Quod unus sit deus, in multis auctoritates probant. Ut in propheta, Audi Israel, deus tuus deus unus est. Et ideo uerus unus est, qui incommunicabilis, inuicibilis. Apyud cum uariis non est transmutatio, nec uisibilis obumbratio quia non est et aliud esse quam sapientem esse unum, et filium, uel essentia genuit essentiam, an omnino non genuit nec gerit, est diuina essentia... Ideo non est dicendum quod pater genuit diuinam essentiam: Quia si pater diceretur genuisse diuinam essentiam, essentia diuina relatiue diceretur ad patrem uel pro relatiue ponere. Trans. Silano, vol. 1, 30.

25. Abelard, Sic et Non 8, 28, ed. Boyer-McKeon, 133, and Theologia Christiana IV, 7, ed. Boyer, 268.

26. The appendix of parallels between the Sic et Non and the Sentences of Lombard drawn up by Boyer and McKeon also shows that neither passage had been taken by Abelard from two of Chartres, implying that it was Abelard who had first appreciated their significance; Abelard, Sic et Non, 635.

27. John of Cornwall, Emlogium, ed. Harting, 265 (n. 6 above).

cause not only do they confirm Otto of Lucca as author of the Summa Sententiarum, but rightly identify the two major influences on that compilation.³⁰ Through the Summa Sententiarum, Peter Lombard absorbed teachings of both Anselm of Laon and Hugh of St-Victor, often critical of ideas being promoted by Peter Abelard.³¹ Peter Lombard's theological synthesis was considerably more original, however, than that of the Summa Sententiarum. Drawing on both the Summa Sententiarum and the Theologia Scholarium, his Sentences combined the textual precision of the key questions and patristic texts presented by Abelard with the clear dogmatic structure provided by Hugh of St-Victor.

One of the few surviving twelfth-century copies of the Theologia Scholarium (Paris, Arsenal 265, not of high textual quality, but belonging to Saint-Victor), also contains a copy of the Summa Sententiarum, to which is appended a list of books borrowed from and sent to magistro P. episcopo by a certain Gauthridus Morici, a servant and perhaps disciple of Peter Lombard.³² The books borrowed from the bishop's library were of pagan authors, while the books Gauthridus brought to the bishop included many scriptural glosses. The fact that the only known copy of the revised version of John of Cornwall's Emlogium, also includes the Summa Sententiarum and the Theologia Scholarium suggests that it might have included here to serve as a warning about how these treatises ought to be read at Saint-Victor.

During the two decades when Peter Lombard was establishing himself as a teacher at the cathedral school of Notre-Dame, his major rival among the secular masters teaching theology was Robert of Melun, an Englishman who taught logic on Mount Sainte-Geneviève in the mid 1130s before turning to theology under the influence of both Abelard and Hugh of St-Victor. Robert would continue to teach both dialectic and theology most likely at Sainte-Geneviève, until 1163, when he was appointed bishop of Hereford.³³ Whereas Lombard was always precise in his quotation of the Fathers and succinct in the formulation of key questions and a final response, Robert of Melun combined the ideas of Abelard and Hugh of St-Victor in emphasising the importance of the interior intention behind a text, rarely quoting them with any precision. In the polemical introduction to his vast two books of Sentences, concerned with ways of reading Scripture, Robert fulminated against "worshippers of the Gloss" and complained that too much theology was losing touch with the inspiration of Scripture.

num, iustum, bonum. Cum autem dicitur iustus, sapiens et cetera, non diuertatem proprietatum ostendimus, que in deo nulla est, sed diuersos effectus quos deus in creaturis operatur. Cum enim iustus dicitur: intelligimus quia iuste iudicat.
Sapiens, quia sapienter omnia facit et gubernat. Misericors quando dicitur: intel-ligimus quia misericorditer peccatoribus parcat. (= Summa Sententiarum I, 4, PL 176, 47 D-48 A). I am indebted to Ralf Stammberger for supplying a transcription of these manuscripts. The compilation also includes a significant extract, not yet identified: E 14r R 135v «Laurentius Dinkelmeist: Inuenies in eis nullum, sane ponderuebum... Quatuor autem regulas in his agnoscimus: Historiam, Allegoriam, Tropologiam, Anagogen. Historia est que res gestas loquitur». The fact that it is followed by an extract attributed to Hugh, suggests that this is master Lawrence from Durham (d. 1173) who transcribed Hugh's lectures in the 1130s as the Sententie de diuinitate (ed. A.M. Piazzoni, «Studi Medievali», 23 [1982], 912-955). This Lawrence, not to be confused with the poet Lawrence of Durham (d. 1154), came to France on business in 1143, returning to Durham with him a letter from Bernard of Clairvaux (Ep. 543, ed. J. Ledetery, Sacra Bernardi Opera, vol. III Editions Cistercienses, Rome 1977, 510) and subsequently became abbot of Westminster. See E. Mason, «Lawrence (d. 1173), abbot of Westminster», Oxford Dictionary of National Biography, Oxford University Press, available online at <http://www.oxforddnb.com/> index.jsp

30. The case for the authorship of Otto of Lucca is put by F. Gasaldelli, La Summa Sententiarum di Ottone da Lucca. Conclusioni di un dibattito secolare, «Salu-stanum», 42 (1980), 537-546.

31. Luscombe, The School of Peter Abelard, 183-97.

32. Meus, Introduction to Theologia Scholarium, CCM 13, 243-247. Patricia Simemann (Histoire trépartie: un inventaire des livres de Pierre Lombard, un exemplaire de ses Sentences et le déclinant du Psalter de Copenhague, in *Du copiste au collectionneur:
enlignes d'histoire des textes et des bibliothèques en l'honneur d'André Vauchez*, ed. J.-F. Gen-est and D. Nebout-Della Guardia, Brepols, Turnhout 1998, 305-319) rightly observes that Peter Lombard did not bequeath his books to St-Victor, as I mistakenly mentioned in that passage. Whether any of these books borrowed by or from Peter Lombard ever came to St-Victor is uncertain.

33. On Robert of Melun, see Meus, Between the schools of Abelard and Saint-Victor in the mid twelfth century: the witness of Robert of Melun, in Léon de Saint-Victor de Paris: influence et rayonnement du Moyen Âge à l'époque moderne, ed. D. Poullet, Brepols, Turn-hout 2010, 121-134.

At the same time, he referred admiringly to two contemporary masters, one of whom spoke about the sacraments of faith (Hugh of St-Victor), the other about faith and charity (Abelard), whose teaching he had heard in person. Although Robert never identified his adversary by name, Lombard's close dependence on the Gloss suggests that he may have been Robert's target. Robert of Melun's two books of Sentences, compiled in the 1150s, contain much more overtly philosophical reflection on the nature of language than the four books of Peter Lombard, and consistently try to seek a synthesis between the perspectives of Abelard and Hugh of St-Victor. This work is so large and sprawling in its discussions, however, that it never acquired the popularity of Lombard's Sentences. It was simply too unwieldy as well as too imprecise in its citation of patristic references, to be useful within a pedagogical milieu.³⁴

PETER LOMBARD AND THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTOLOGICAL CONTROVERSY

That Lombard's teaching on Christology was already becoming controversial in the early 1150s is suggested by a report of a public debate by the Englishman, Robert of Cricklade.³⁵ Writing probably around 1158, Robert of Cricklade, an Augustinian canon from Oxford, recounted a journey he made to Paris. He wrote: «I remember that Roger, who is now Bishop of Worcester, came to our inn. I asked him with whom he was studying theology, and he replied, "With Master Robert of Melun." "I am very pleased," I said, "as I feared that you had been ensnared by that heretic

[Peter Lombard]».³⁶ Roger asked Robert Cricklade to explain the ways in which Peter Lombard could be said to be a heretic. Robert recalled that he told Roger that Peter Lombard «separates man from God, so that he is not one human person with God in the Trinity, who is really the Son of God.»³⁷ These intriguing comments, emerging from an Englishman who had only recently arrived in Paris, demonstrate something of the degree to which academic gossip about error and heresy spread among educated circles in Europe. National rivalries may have exacerbated such rumour-mongering. Peter Lombard was an Italian, teaching at Notre-Dame, while Robert of Melun attracted English disciples, like Robert of Cricklade, Roger of Worcester, and John of Cornwall. Achard, Richard and Walter of St-Victor are similarly all reported as of English background.³⁸

Robert's allegation that Peter Lombard «separates man from God, so that he is not one human person with God in the Trinity» summarised crudely the charges made against him in the years following the publication of the Sentences. The allegations that would plague the reputation of Peter Lombard over the second half of the twelfth century crystallized around his discussion of Christology in the third book of the Sentences. He was accused of minimising Christ's humanity to the point that it could be considered a nil, hence the charge that he was guilty of nihilism. There has been much debate about whether or not Lombard was

34. Less than half of Robert's Sententie has been edited by R.-M. Martin, Œuvres de Robert of Melun, 3 vols, Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense, Louvain 1932-1952, in particular vol. III, 1 (1947) and (with R.M. Gallert), vol. III, 2 (1952); see also M. Perkanis, Robert von Melun und die Rezeption der Abaelardischen Ethik im 12. Jahrhundert, Nebst einer kritischen Edition von Robert von Melun, Sententiae, I, II, [6], 164-171 und I, 1, 8-79-84, «Recherches de théologie et philosophie médiévales», 75.1 (2008), 33-76.

35. R. W. Hunt, English Learning in the late Twelfth Century, «Transactions of the Royal Historical Society», 4th ser., 19 (1930), 19-42, esp. 32; on the likelihood of a date around 1151, see D.M. Coulter, Per Visibilia ad Invisibilia. Theological Method in Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173), Brepolis, Turnhout 2006, 247.

36. Robert Cricklade, Symbolion fidei, in Hunt, English Learning in the Late Twelfth Century, 37. «Memini enim me dominum Rogerum, qui nunc est Wigornensis episcopus, venisse ad hospitium nostrum. Quem cum interrogassem apud quem in divina pagina studeret, et responderet, "Apud magistrum Robertum Melunensem." "Perplacet," inquam, "invebam enim, ne te teneret inviscum hereticas ille?"».

37. Robert Cricklade, Symbolion fidei, ed. Hunt, 37-38: «Separat, inquam, hominem a Deo, ut non sit una persona homo Deo in trinitate, qui revera filius Dei est».

38. See H. Piatelle, Gauier de Saint-Victor, in Dictionnaire d'Histoire et de Géographie Ecclésiastiques, 20, Leionzey et Ané, Paris 1984, col. III. Achard was remembered in an epitaph at Saint-Victor as Anglonum gloria cleri. On Achard, see J. Chailion, Spéculogé, spiritualité et métaphysique dans l'œuvre oratoire d'Achard de Saint-Victor, Vrin, Paris 1958.

ing from the school of Anselm of Laon. The fact that Vacarius, an Italian lawyer resident in England, who may have engaged in debate with Bandinus in the course of travelling to northern France in 1164, would write his own treatise de homine assumpto, asserting the reality of Christ as a human being assumed by God, suggests that it may have been Lombard's disciples rather than Lombard himself who projected views that seemed to challenge authority.⁴⁴ Gerhoch was much bolder, however, in asserting that Lombard himself was the source of error.

PETER LOMBARD AND HIS CRITICS

During the first half of the twelfth century, the major theological competition within Paris had been between the schools associated with the abbey of Sainte-Genève and St-Victor. This rivalry would subside in 1147, when, following the death of the dean of Sainte-Genève, Stephen of Garlande, the abbey was taken over by canons of St-Victor. The success of Peter Lombard at the cathedral school of Notre-Dame, however, may have created stronger rivalry between Notre-Dame and the schools of the left bank during the 1150s. The cathedral and its school would become even more prominent in Paris after Peter Lombard's successor, Maurice de Sully (bishop of Paris from 1160 to 1196), initiated its rebuilding in the new Gothic style. This had the potential to reinforce rivalry between the cathedral and Saint-Victor, the building of which had started during the first half of the twelfth century.

Paradoxically, Maurice de Sully was, prior to becoming bishop, among those who had accused Peter Lombard of espousing heretical views in Christology. John of Cornwall reports that he had been turned away from following Peter Lombard during lectures of Maurice and Robert of Melun.⁴⁵ John also quotes from the De trinitate of Achard, who succeeded to Gilduin as abbot of St-Victor from 1155 to 1162 (when he was appointed bishop of the Norman see of Avranches),⁴⁶ in theologically sophisticated sermons, Achard took issue with the view linked with Lombard: 'There are still certain enemies of truth who say that when the Word was made man, he was not made anything, nor in that which he is a man is he something which we are'.⁴⁷ Achard was no opponent of theological innovation, being a speculative thinker of a high order, fascinated by Platonic themes and arguments from reason. In his work on the Trinity, for example, he was fascinated by the notion of the divine substance generating an uncreated plurality of essences, out of which the Trinity could be perceived.⁴⁸ These remarks show his concern about the effect of dialectical reasoning upon the definition of doctrine, if it threatened to limit understanding of the outpouring of divine essence in the persons of the Godhead.

Achard was also a major influence on Richard, another Englishman who came to St-Victor probably around 1145, rising to be-

45. John of Cornwall, Enalogium, ed. Häring, 268: 'Quos etiam venerabiles magistros: quos in theologia certissimum: est nichil hereticum doluisse. Robertum scilicet Melodiensem et Mauricium hodiernum. Parisiensem episcopum, silentio pretere non debeo. Eorum, utique super his questionibus scripta non legi, sed multis eorum libris et disputationibus interfui, in quibus et de homine assumpto et de his quibuscumque magistri Petri Lombardi doctrinam falsitatis arguebant, ne dicam erroris'.

46. John of Cornwall, Enalogium, ed. Häring, 268. On Richard of St-Victor, see Coulter, Per Visibilia ad Invisibilia, on Maurice de Sully, see J. Longère, Graves oratoires de maîtres parisiens au XIIe siècle. Étude historique et doctrinale, Institut d'études augustiniennes, Paris 1975, and id., Les sermons latins de Maurice de Sully, évêque de Paris (1160): contribution à l'histoire de la tradition manuscrite, Kluwer Academic Publishers, Dordrecht 1988. The close sympathy of Maurice de Sully as bishop for St-Victor is observed by Chr. Gert, Les actes de Maurice de Sully relatifs aux possessions parisiennes de Saint-Victor (1180-1196), in Hauteville centenaire de Notre-Dame de Paris, 35-52.

47. Achard de Saint-Victor, Sermons inédits, ed. J. Chastillon, Vrin, Paris 1970, 61-62: 'Sunt adhuc quidam inimici veritatis qui dicunt quod quando Verbum factum est homo, non est factum aliquid, nec in eo quod est homo est aliquid quod nos sumus. See Chastillon, Théologie spirituelle et métaphysique, 203-206.

48. Chastillon, Théologie spirituelle et métaphysique, 302-312. See M.-Th. d'Alverny, Le chant de Saint-Victor. De l'initiation à l'initiale et plurielle: exantennum, Arch. Theol. Anc. Méd., 2 (1954), 229-305.

44. Vacarius, De homine assumpto, ed. N. Häring, Med. Stud., 21 (1959), 147-175; see J. Taliaferro, Law and Theology in the Twelfth Century, Brepols, Turnhout 2006, and in more detail, The Lombard, Bandinus, and Vacarius: Christological Nihilism and the Anglo-Norman Realm, in Mind Matters: Studies on Medieval and Early Modern Intellectual History in Honor of Marcia Colish, ed. C. J. Nederman, N. Van Deusen and E. Ann Matter, Brepols, Turnhout 2009, 133-156.

come superior in 1158, and then prior from 1162 until his death in 1172. Although Richard never engaged in extreme polemic in the fashion of his successor as prior, Walter of St-Victor, his intellectual influence in questioning Peter Lombard's presentation of the Trinity should not be underestimated. Richard never composed any book of sentences. He preferred to compose treatises that had a contemplative goal, tracing the mystical connections between the Old and New Testaments (including the book of Revelation), while also arguing that the mind could be led through rational argument about the visible world to an invisible realm of reflection. In his speculative masterpiece, the De Trinitate (a work that survives in over fifty manuscripts), he reflected on the Godhead as an outpouring of supreme love manifest through each of the three persons. Unlike Peter Lombard, Richard never quoted explicitly from the Fathers of the Church, but rather followed Acharid and St Anselm (an author never quoted by Peter Lombard), in seeking to develop a wholly rational reflection on the nature of supreme substance, arguing «from experience, ratiocination and beliefs».⁴⁹ He had a particular fondness for inventing abstract terms like substantialitas to invoke what is general to specific species and Danielitas the specific reality of an individual, called Daniel.⁵⁰ Richard drew on St Anselm to argue for the importance of intellectual understanding arising from faith in a supreme good that manifest as power, wisdom and goodness, manifest as Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

Whereas Augustine had favoured comparing the Trinity to memory, intellect and will within the soul of a single person, Richard of St-Victor extended Acharid's idea that divine love requires that there should be a plurality of persons. He devoted much philosophical discussion to the difference between substance and person without ever referring explicitly to Aristotle. Richard's argument that charity requires that love extended to a plurality of persons drew on the same passage of Gregory the Great as Abelard had used in the Theologia to argue that the Holy Spirit, as charity, had to exist between two persons.⁵¹ This is philosophical theology of a high order of abstraction, modelled on the authority of St Anselm rather than of Peter Lombard. He insisted that reason demanded a trinity of persons in God, but excluded any quaternity.⁵² By looking at the divine nature as caritas seeking plurality, he created a very different vision of the Trinity from that presented by Peter Lombard, who used Augustine's definition in the De doctrina Christiana to perform a type of category analysis.⁵³ Richard was more keen to articulate the mystical connections that bound sacred persons together.

In the sixth and final book of the De trinitate, Richard reflected on the profound kinship (germanitas) between parent and child as a model for understanding the nature of the relationship between the three persons of the Trinity. After concluding that power, wisdom, and goodness are to be attributed to the Father, Son and Holy Spirit respectively, he engaged in the only polemical section within the whole work, a diatribe against those who argue that substance cannot beget substance, referring explicitly to ventra exposita, certainly an allusion to Lombard's Sentences: «But many in our time have arisen who do not dare to say this, or rather, what is much more dangerous, they dare to deny against the authority of the holy Fathers and so many assertions of patristic tradition, and

51. Richard of St. Victor, De trinitate, III, 2, ed. Ribaillet, 196: «Oportet inquit ut amor in alterum tendat ut caritas esse queat. Ubi ergo pluralitas personarum deest, caritas omnino esse non potest». Cf. Abelard, Theologia Scholastica, II, 123, ed. Buy-riart-McEw, 469: «Caritas autem, teste Gregorio, munus quam inter duos haberi non potest. Nemo enim, inquit, ad semetipsum habere caritatem proprie dicitur, sed dilectione si in alterum extendit ut esse caritas possit». The reference is to Gregory, Hom. in Evangelia I, hom. 17, PL 76, 1139 B.

52. Richard of St. Victor, De trinitate, V, 14-15, 21, ed. Ribaillet, 212-214, 219.

53. J. Bligh presents the contrast between Augustine's psychological and Richard's social analysis of the Trinity, and suggests that Richard may have been influenced in this by Abelard, Richard of St-Victor's De Trinitate: Augustinian or Abelardian? «Herthrop Journal», 1 (1960), 118-130. D.E. Luscombe is more reserved about Abelard's influence, The School of Peter Abelard, 302-304.

49. Richard of St. Victor, De trinitate, I, 1, ed. J. Ribaillet, Var, Paris 1958, 86: «Rerum notitiam, ni fallor, modo triplici apprehendimus: nam alia experiendo probanus, alia ratiocinando colligimus, aliorum certitudinem credendo tenemus».

50. Richard of St. Victor, De trinitate, II, 12, ed. Ribaillet, 118-119.

they try to refute in every way. They do not concede in any way that substance begets substance, or wisdom wisdom. They stubbornly deny what all the saints affirm.... Your exposition strives to this, that we believe that substance does not beget substance. The faithful exposition, worthy of full acceptance, asserts that what the holy Fathers equally assert, is false, and contends that what none of the saints assert is true. But they say: "If the substance of the Son is begotten, that of the Father is unbegotten, how can there be one and the same substance of both?"⁵⁴ This was an issue of great importance to Richard. Given that this is precisely the claim made by Peter Lombard at the outset of his Sentences, that substance does not beget substance, there can be little doubt that Richard was consciously challenging the arguments that Lombard had held, most likely during the 1160s.⁵⁵

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST LOMBARD'S CHRISTOLOGY

While Richard of St-Victor was quite original in raising criticisms of Peter Lombard's Trinitarian theology in his De trinitate, most of the public controversy centred around his Christological ideas – accusations that were always very difficult to substantiate. Lombard's Christology was debated in the Pope's presence at Tours in May 1163 and again in December 1164 at Sens.⁵⁶ While the pope reportedly put Maurice de Sully under particular pressure to prohibit undisciplined theological debate about the nature of Christ, the official proceedings of both councils did not record any official judgment against Lombard.⁵⁷ Yet in 1170, the Pope was explicit in instructing William, Archbishop of Sens, and his suffragans to halt the spread of Lombard's teaching: «When you were once in our presence, we enjoined you verbally that you explicitly urge and effectively summon your suffragans who are associated with you at Paris, to renounce the vicious doctrine of Peter, erstwhile bishop of Paris, in which it is said that Christ, according to his being a man, is not anything».⁵⁸ Alexander also warned William that he was «imposing this firmly and distinctly to all, that anyone who should presume to teach this doctrine among others shall be solemnly denounced (detestetur)».⁵⁹ Detestor is a strong word here, having both religious and legal meanings, respectively, to be cursed and abominated, or, to be renounced under oath. It has been argued that this statement hinted that Alexander was planning to put the issue on the agenda at Lateran III, proclaimed in 1177.⁶⁰ In early 1177 Alexander wrote again to William, who was now at Reims, strengthening the earlier injunction, anathematizing anyone who promulgated the formula Christus secundum quod est homo, non est aliquid.⁶¹

⁵⁷ See above n. 42.

⁵⁸ Alexander III, Ep. 744 Willielmo PL 200, 683 B; also in Chartularium Universitatis Parisiensis, ed. H. Denifle, vol. 1, Paris 1889, 4; Jaffe-Wattenbach, Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, vol. II, no. 11866: «Cum in nostra olim esses praesentia constitutus, tibi viva voce injunximus, ut suffraganis tuis Parisius tibi ascitis ad interrogationem prave doctrine Petri quondam Parisiensis episcopi, qua dicitur quod Christus secundum quod est homo non est ...». In the version printed as Ep. 743 of Pope Alexander, PL 200, 683 BC, the words Petri quondam Parisiensis episcopi are omitted.

⁵⁹ Alexander III, Ep. 744 Willielmo PL 200, 683 C: «universis firmiter et distincte injungens, quod doctrinam illam de cetero nequaquam docere praesumant, sed ipsam penitus detestentur».

⁶⁰ Colish, Peter Lombard, 429.

⁶¹ Denifle, Chartularium Universitatis Parisiensis, I, 8–9: «Cum Christus perfectus Deus sit homo, mirum est, qua temeritate quidam audet dicere, quod Christus non sit aliquid secundum quod est homo. Ne autem tanta possit in ecclesia Dei abusus suboriri vel error induci, fraternitati tue per apostolica scripta mandavimus, quantum convocatis magistris scolasticis Parisiensium et Remensium et aliarum circumpositarum, civitatum auctoritate nostra sub anathemate interdicas, ac quis de cetero

⁵⁴ Richard of St. Victor, De trinitate, VI, 22, ed. Ribaillet, 259–260: «Sed multo temporibus nostris surrexere qui non audent hoc dicere, quin potius, quod multo periculosius est, contra sanctorum Patrum auctoritatem et tot attestaciones patrum traditionum audent negare et modis omnibus conantur refellere. Nullo modo concedunt quod substantia generat substantiam, vel sapientia sapientiam. Perinaciter negant quod omnes sancti affirmant: ... vestra expositio ad hoc contendit, ut credamus quod substantia substantiam non generat. Fidelis exposito et omni acceptatione digna, que hoc quod sancti Patres pariter clamant contendit esse falsum, et quod nemo sanctorum asserit contendit esse verum! Sed dicunt: «Si Fili substantia est genita, Patres vero ingenua, quomodo utriusque erit una eadem substantia?»».

⁵⁵ Ribaillet, introduction to Richard of St. Victor, De trinitate, 11–12.

⁵⁶ J. Chastillon, Latran III et l'enseignement doctrinal de Pierre Lombard, in Le troisième concile de Latran (1179). Sa place dans l'histoire, ed. J. Longère, Études Augustiniennes, Paris 1982, 75–90, esp. 77–82.

On the eve of the III Lateran Council, held in 1179, John of Cornwall would remind the Pope of his 1170 ruling within a treatise, urging him to act again against ideas that were continuing to hold sway in the Parisian schools.⁶² He wrote a letter to Alexander «since, with many scholars inebriated from this chalice [of error], they turn around, up until this day, and stubbornly abuse your patience with this madness, those who by no means praise the pious dispensation of your mercy, but preach an irreverent dogma as if were catholic».⁶³ He petitioned the Pope to include the matter of Christology on the agenda for the council so that the matter can be resolved once and for all. His reasons for doing so, according to the text, was that he wanted to save the reputation of Peter Lombard from those who conflated him with his followers. John wrote: «A little before he was elected Bishop of Paris, I heard Peter Lombard protest to me and to others present, that he had not asserted his own opinion, but only that which he had received from masters... Since then certain men more chatty than wise ought not even have been heard in a bedroom, have preached [Christological error] from the rooftops, right up until today».⁶⁴ It would seem that the success of the Sentences as a textbook had produced, in the eyes of many, excessively noisy speculation on all manner of sacred things.

Walter of St-Victor composed an even more polemical treatise, Contra quatuor labyrinthos Franciae, that identified both Lombard dicere audeat Christum non esse aliquid secundum quod homo, quia sicut verus Deus ita verus est homo ex anima rationali et humana carne subsistens».

62. John of Cornwall, Enlógium, see also E. Rathbone, John of Cornwall: a biography, «Rech. Théol. Anc. Méd.», 17 (1950), 46–60.

63. John of Cornwall, Enlógium, ed. Häring, 258: «Quoniam itaque infuit scolares hoc calice dehiati et in furorē uersi usque in hodiernum patentiā vestre contumaciter abutuntur, qui nequaquam misericordie vestre piam dispensationē laudant sed impiū dogma uelut catholicū predicant».

64. John of Cornwall, Enlógium, ed. Häring, 265: «Preterea paulo ante quam electus esset in episcopium Parisiensem, michi et omnibus auditoribus suis qui tunc aderant protestans est, quod hoc non esset assertio sua sed opinio sola, quam a magistro acceperat... Postea uero per quosdam homines loquaces magis quam perspicaces que nec in cubiculis essent audienda usque hodie predicantur super recta».

and Peter of Poitiers (described as provost of the schools of Peter Comestor), as just as serious threats to orthodoxy as Peter Abelard and Gilbert of Poitiers.⁶⁵ It constituted a crude attack upon the intellectual rivals of the Victorines, past and present.⁶⁶ The treatise was a scathing invective that described the four labyrinths, Abelard, Gilbert of Poitiers, Peter of Poitiers and Peter Lombard, as having «the loquacity of putrid frogs» and being «poisoned on the spirit of Aristotle».⁶⁷ Walter's purpose in writing the work, was to keep the issue of Peter Lombard's Christology alive since, in spite of John of Cornwall's efforts, Alexander had decided to leave off the issue at Lateran III. Whether or not he was himself present at the Council, Walter argued that the Pope had wanted to condemn Lombard at this Council, but that he encountered resistance from his Cardinals: «Pope Alexander recently prepared to condemn by name his [Peter Lombard's] Sententie at the Roman Council by which, that diabolical error of the new heretics has erupted again, that in as much as Christ is a man, he is nothing (trihū)».⁶⁸ Apparently, one of the cardinals present (Adam of St Asaph, formerly provost of the schools of Peter Lombard), complained to the Pope, «Lord, let us undertake to consider more

65. See above n. 6.

66. P. Glorieux, Manuscrit action et manuscrit harawi: Le Contra quatuor labyrinthos Francie de Gauthier de Saint-Victor, «Rech. Théol. Anc. Méd.», 21 (1954), 179–193. See now the close study of Walter's treatise by Rossi, Contra Lombardum in Pietro Lombardo, 228–144 (n. 1 above).

67. Le Contra quatuor labyrinthos Francie de Gauthier de Saint-Victor, ed. Glorieux, 201: «puente ranarum garrulitates... uno aristotelico spiritu afflato».

68. Le Contra quatuor labyrinthos Francie de Gauthier de Saint-Victor, ed. Glorieux, 201: «Hoc etiam sciendum quod Alexander papa nuper in concilio romano pariterat nominationem illius sententias dammare quarum argumentis etiam Ari et Sabellius et novorum hereticorum error diabolicus recrudescit, scilicet quod Christus nichil sit secundum quod homo. Quidam uero cardinalium causam Dei et fidei christiane religionis quas amas et utitur, alienis negociis potporantem, non recte respondentes dicunt uenerabili pape: «Demone, alia maiora suscipimus tractanda. Tunc apostolicus: Immo prima: et maximum de fide et hereticis agendum est. Quod illi audientes egressi sunt de consistorio. Quidam etiam episcopi, Adam walsius exiit cum illis dicens: Domine papa, ego et ceteris et episcopis olim scoliarum eius, defendendam sententiam magister».

serious issues), to which the Pope replied, «On the contrary, first we must deal with faith and with heretics.» Walter presented the diabolical error as having evidently infected the cardinals with whom Alexander was meeting. Nonetheless, there is no official record from Lateran III recording Lombard's condemnation, suggesting that his supporters did in fact achieve a silent victory, leaving his critics troubled by the extent of his influence.

Walter's work was highly provocative in its doctrinal recasting. The Christological statement that had already concerned the Pope and John of Cornwall was the discussion «Whether Christ, according to his being a man, is a person or anything (non est aliquid).» Walter, however, said that Peter Lombard and his followers had argued «that in as much as Christ is a man, he is nothing (nichil).» The use of aliquid, although very problematic, was less problematic than Walter's formulation. The ambivalence of the aliquid implied that Christ, in his fullness, was not a composite being in the way that humans are composite beings. Walter's turn to nichil lost that nuance, and accused Peter Lombard of denying Christ's humanity altogether. Walter's semantic recasting, albeit crude and sloppy, was pointed. It made literal what that Christological formula had been accused of doing, rendering Christ's humanity into nothing, and therefore promulgating heresy.

In raising issues about Lombard's Christology, both John of Cornwall and Walter of Saint-Victor were creating an atmosphere of polemical argument very different from the abstract theological concerns of Richard of Saint-Victor. In spite of the pressure placed upon Alexander III by John and Walter for a public discussion of these issues, the Pope was resistant to a public trial of the sort that had been seen with Abelard and Gilbert of Poitiers. While the Pope was prepared to issue strong interdicts in writing, there is no record of his assuming a public judicial posture regarding these issues. Consequently, the opportunity for adversarial drama became more limited, the creation of combative personas was less encouraged. It is much harder to write a narrative of winners and losers without the battles. The quarrels seem to end with whimpers rather than bangs. The Christological ideas attributed to Peter Lombard by John and Walter continued to be debated in the schools, but did not generate further polemical treatises.⁶⁹

By contrast, the theological argument raised in the conclusion of Richard of St-Victor's De trinitate was of a different order. Richard was fully familiar with speculative argument in theology, but insisted on defining God not as a summa quaedam res but as overflowing divine love, mediated directly through the persons of the Trinity. Like so many of his contemporaries, Richard drew elements of his thinking from both Abelard and Hugh of St-Victor. Yet for all his fascination with abstract forms, his diving argument was that God's divine nature was mediated fully and directly through Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Richard's vigorous refutation in the De trinitate of those who denied that substance generated substance in the Trinity, was a much more serious argument than any polemical claim made by John of Cornwall and Walter of St-Victor in relation to Lombard's Christology. It was one that would be followed up in more detail by Joachim of Fiore.

JOACHIM OF FIORE AND PETER LOMBARD

Whether Joachim was present at the III Lateran Council in 1179, and thus learned at first hand about the tension reported by Walter of Saint-Victor between disciples of Peter Lombard, like Cardinal Adam, and his critics, or had seen Walter's polemical treatise, is not certain. Even if he may not have known Geoffrey of Auxerre, forced to resign as abbot of Clairvaux in 1165, when he became abbot of Fossanova (1170-76) and subsequently an adver-

69. M. Colish provides the most exhaustive summary of the issue in her Christological Milieu in the Second Half of the Twelfth Century, «Rech. Theol. Anc. Méd.», 63 (1996), 146-35. In this article Colish argues that while the Lombard always remained cautious in his Christology, a number of his supporters were not so. She assumes that this is because they misunderstood the orthodoxy of Peter Lombard's Sententiae. She wrote the article primarily in response to Lauge Olaf Nielsen, Theology and Philosophy in the Twelfth Century: A Study of Gilbert Porret's Thinking and the Theological Expositions of the Doctrine of the Incarnation in the Period 1150-1180, Brill, Leiden 1982, 264-361. In this work Nielsen argued that Peter Lombard had a coherent school who consistently proposed the habitus theory after the death of their master.

sary, Joachim was actively engaged at the time of the Council in seeking to affiliate his abbey at Corazzo to the Cistercian Order.⁷⁰ He was then immersing himself in the writings of Bernard of Clairvaux, whose prophetic style he wished to emulate, although with an exegetical approach that was his own.

The only passage in which Joachim is known to explicitly castigate Lombard by name occurs in his De vita sancti Benedicti, written in 1186, within a passage that contrasts how monastic liturgy can teach the trine nature of God through using three readings in the night office in winter, but only one in summer, with the in-pious instruction offered by Sabellius, Arius, and «the blasphemous of Peter, who by dividing the unity from the Trinity introduced quaternity».⁷¹ Joachim's treatise explained how Benedict ushered in the age of the Spirit, prefigured in the Old Testament, and how the Cistercians renewed this spirit after a long period of corruption within the monastic order. He believed that the monastic life gave better instruction in the mystery of the Trinity than any scholastic in Paris. His was a prophetic voice, sharply critical of the worldliness of the Church and convinced that reformed monasticism could not merely understand, but actually enact the mission of the Holy Spirit.

Whether the treatise condemned in 1215 is a lost work of Joachim, explicitly directed against Lombard's theology, or rather Joachim's first major work on the Trinity, the Psalterium decem chordarum (in which there is criticism of the notion of quaternity, but Lombard is not himself named in person), begun around 1183-84 is not completely certain. Joachim seems to have revised the Psalterium between 1194-96 and 1200, when it received its present title.⁷² Possiby the Council was condemning an earlier version of the work, in which Joachim had been more explicitly critical of Peter Lombard. Joachim's criticisms related not to Peter Lombard's Christology, but to his very specific understanding of the Trinity, substantiated through a specific passage of the first book of the Sentences. The abbot of Fiore criticised any attempt to separate the divine essence from the three persons.⁷³ At the outset of his Psalterium decem chordarum, Joachim asserted that the three divine persons share fully in the divine substance. He rejected the perversity of those who introduced a quaternity into God.⁷⁴ Towards the end of that treatise, Joachim followed his criticism of Sabellius and Arius by fulfilling: «Oh how perversely in every way he has corrected both, who says that a certain supreme thing common to three persons is a single thing, but that each person is that substance», thus creating a quaternity rather than a trinity in God.⁷⁵ In one of the three known copies of the Figure of Joachim (Dresden, Sachsche Landesbibliothek A 121, f. 89^v, copied in the late thirteenth century), we find a visual illustration of Joachim's understanding of the heresies of Sabellius, Arius, and then of Lombard's view, introduced as ⁷⁰ French translation (by Andrew Robiglio) of a lecture, accessible online at: Divina 2 (2006). See also his major work on Joachim, Il tempo dell'Apocalisse. Vita di Gioacchino da Fiore, Laterza, Rome 2004, 41 and 240-241.

⁷¹ M. Reeves, The Influence of Prebuiy in the Later Middle Ages, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1909, 30-31.

⁷² «Sed nec ut res olivas que unius sunt carnis sed tamen corporum proprietate distinctae, neque ut res ramos uni radici infixos: ut substantiam radicem et res ramos propterea arbitris iuxta aliquorum perfidiam, quod est inducere quaternitatem» Joachim von Fiore, Psalterium decem chordarum, I, dist. 1, ed. K.-V. Selge, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Quellen zur Geistesgeschichte des Mittelalters, Band 20, Habnische Buchhandlung, Hannover 2009, 20 = ed. Venise 1927 (repr. Minerva, Frankfurt 1965), f. 229^b.

⁷³ «Quoniam perverse modis multis excedavit utrumque qui dicit unam substantiam esse quandam summam rem communem tribus personis et singulam personam esse illam substantiam. Tale est curia acsi pro substantia ponatur certum numerus, pro personis autem decem aut tres; aut, si non vult illam dicere maiorem cuiusque persone, acsi tres decem penetrantur pro personis et quatuor decematis pro substantia; namquam si non esset Deus Trinitas sed quaternitas, Joachim von Fiore, Psalterium decem chordarum, I, [6], ed. Selge, 341 = ed. Venise 1927 (repr. 1965), f. 277^{a-b}.

⁷⁰ F. Gascardelli, Goffredo di Asseano e Gioacchino da Fiore. Testi e personaggi a confronto, first published in 1988, reprinted in Id., Studi su san Bernardo e Goffredo di Asseano, Edizioni del Galluzzo, Florence 2001, 375-422.

⁷¹ Joachim abbas Florentinus, Tractatus in expositionem vite et regule beati Benedicti, III, 2, ed. A. Paschowsky, Istituto Storico Italiano per il Medio Evo, Roma 2008 (Fonti per la storia dell'Italia medievale, Antiquitates, 29), 208: «tertio blasphemum Petri, qui unitatem a Trinitate dividens quaternitatem inducit».

⁷² Gian Luca Poretti has revived the possibility that the text condemned in 1215 is Joachim's Psalterium decem chordarum, in Joachim de Fiore dans la recherche actuelle.

Perfidia, in which the three divine persons are separated from the divine essence. This contrasts with his representation of Ecce catholica, in which the three persons issue seamlessly from divine essence.⁷⁶ The fact that these figures were physically cut out of a copy of the Figure from the first quarter of the thirteenth century suggests that the official condemnation of Joachim's criticism of Peter Lombard in 1215 was not without effect.⁷⁷

According to the passage quoted by Lateran IV, Joachim argued that the multiplicity of the Trinity was like that of any collective. The three persons were multiple and yet one in the same way as many people were said to be one people. The people of the church were not one church as «a certain single thing is common to many, but because of the unity of catholic faith, and one kingdom because of the union of indissoluble charity». To suppose this, he had adduced the saying of Christ, «I want, Father, that they be one in us, just as we are one, so that they may be perfected as one» (John 17, 21). While Joachim would become widely known for developing an eschatological vision of history, involving the manifestation of the Trinity through an age of the Father, an age of the Son, and an age of the Holy Spirit, he also had a clear vision of the three divine persons as each fully consubstantial with the divine substance. To deny this plurality was to deny the divinity of each of the three persons.

Joachim gave no indication that he was aware of the specific Christological debate that Lombard had provoked through the third book of Sentences, signalled by Gerhoch of Reichersberg as problematic in 1163.⁷⁸ Rather he was shocked by the passage from

76. M. Reeves and B. Hirsch-Reich, The Figure of Joachim of Fiore, Clarendon Press, Oxford 1972, 212-223; illustrated in Plate 30; reproduced schematically by B. McGinn, The Calabrian Abbot, Joachim of Fiore in the History of Western Thought, MacMillan, New York 1985, 165.

77. The image has been cut out of Oxford, Corpus Christi College 355A, ff. 4-6, copied in the first quarter of the thirteenth century, of which an indirect copy has been made in Reggio Emilia, Bibl. Sem., R. 1, ff. 1-20, from the second half of the thirteenth century; Reeves and Hirsch-Reich, The Figure, 76-77, 100-102.

78. Gerhoch of Reichersberg, De Gloria et honore Filii hominis, PL 194, 1097-8; «Quod sub nomine Augustini Petrus, modernus glossator, interxit suis glossis, ubi the opening of the first book of Sentences in which Peter Lombard had insisted that divine essence had not itself generated divine persons as the Son, but rather was a supreme reality quite distinct from the three persons.⁷⁹ Joachim read Peter Lombard as contradicting the assertion in the Athanasian Creed about the divinity of the Son of God as «God from God, begotten not made, of one substance with the Father, through whom all things were made».

Joachim's criticism of Peter Lombard's Trinitarian theology is sometimes explained as the result of his desire to extend the hostility of Bernard of Clairvaux towards schoolmen like Peter Abelard and Gilbert of Poitiers; Joachim could be projecting onto Lombard Bernard's criticism of Gilbert's notion that an abstract form, namely deitas, was separate from deus.⁸⁰ Yet Joachim was not questioning schoolmen, without having any idea of the serious theological differences between the major masters of his day. Bernard had helped Peter Lombard during his early studies at Reims and then at Saint-Victor in the 1130s and had been supported by Peter Lombard at Reims in 1148, along with other masters, in arguing against certain propositions made by Gilbert of Poitiers.⁸¹ Bernard's interventions in 1141 and 1148 were directed not against scholastic method in general, but against specific doctrines taught by the two major rivals of Peter Lombard. The fact that one of the earliest surviving manuscripts of the Sentences (Troyes MS 900), bearing an inscription with the date 1158, was owned by the College of St Bernard in the thirteenth century suggests that Cistercian students were encouraged to study Lombard's theology.

assignavit homini dulum, Verbo latium, cum beatus Augustinus hoc mirum senserit. Qui iudans de practico scabellu adorando, nullum patris facti meritozom dilue. Quod creditus Petrus creditur postea deprehendisse, quia in sententiarum suarum libro octavo, ubi opuscula quorundam pontificum existantur Deo latium, et homini dulum exhibenda in Christo, nullam faci mentionem Augustini. Sed in eodem libro, ubi Augustini sententiam commemorat de adorando scabellu pedum Domini, penitus nulla est mentio dula, sicut isti mendaces asserunt, homini assumpto exhibenda».

79. See above n. 18.

80. This view is maintained by Potesa, Il tempo dell'Apocalisse, 39.

81. See above, nn. 9, 10.

In England, France and Germany, criticisms of Peter Lombard's orthodoxy were made most loudly, not by Cistercian monks, but by Augustinian canons – in particular Gerhoch of Reichersberg, John of Cornwall, and Walter of Saint-Victor. Joachim's precise awareness of a crucial passage near the opening of the Sentences shows that he was an intelligent and perceptive reader, quite different from those critics who made blanket condemnations of Lombard's Christology. Given that a number of allusions to Richard's writing have been identified in the first part of Joachim's Psalterium, it seems logical to assume that Joachim was influenced by Richard's criticism of Lombard's Trinitarian theology in developing his own thinking on the subject.⁸²

Richard of St-Victor had provided a brilliant example of how abstract theological reflection could be harnessed to Scripture in a way that was very different from that of either Peter Lombard or Gilbert of Poitiers. Rather than reacting against schoolmen in general, Joachim was troubled by a very specific argument of Peter Lombard. While his way of explaining the Trinity was not the same as that of Richard, he shared Richard's conviction that the three persons of the Trinity each communicated divine substance in their fullness, but gave more detail in quoting directly from the Sentences. The approach of Richard and Joachim to the Trinity was very different from that of Peter Lombard, who steered away from any formulation of personal experience in analysing doctrine.

Richard of St-Victor's concluding polemic in the De trinitate is so similar to that raised by Joachim about the opening of the Sentences that Joachim may have been alerted to its argument, either by Richard's treatise or perhaps by students familiar with the novel aspect of this part of Peter Lombard's discussion. While Joachim's notion of concordance between Old and New Testaments, as well as his particular interest in the book of Revelation, is more richly symbolic than that of Richard of St-Victor, and more acute in its criticism of monastic corruption, there is a continuity of theological concern that should not be ignored.

By the time Richard died in 1173, it was perhaps inevitable that the public school of St-Victor should begin to lose some of its power to attract students to its public school. Walter's attitude to secular masters was more aggressive than that of Richard, and also different from that of Godfrey of St-Victor (d. 1185), whose Miraculosus offers a much more nuanced commentary on the various schools of Paris in the late twelfth century.⁸³ The division within the abbey between their attitudes would mark the end of Saint-Victor as a leading centre of intellectual inquiry.

When Pope Innocent III sided with Lombard in the declaration of Faith of 1215, he was seeking to suppress any lingering voices of criticism being made against a theologian, whose Four Books of Sentences were proving an immensely popular foundation for theological study.

INNOCENT III AND PETER LOMBARD

Why then, after the refusal of Alexander III to respond officially to complaints made against Peter Lombard, did Innocent and his cardinals act so assertively at Lateran IV? One answer might be found in tracing the history of the intellectual preparation for Lateran IV, as John Baldwin has done so well.⁸⁴ Lothar de Segni (c. 1160/61-1216) was thoroughly embedded in the key theological networks of his time. He was, as with so many other young clerics of ambition, trained in the liberal arts in the schools of Paris prior to spending many years in the papal curia and then becoming

⁸² Richard's De trinitate is noted in the apparatus to other parts of this opening section of Joachim von Fiore, Psalterium decem cordatum I, dist. I, ed. Selge, 18, 32-40; Selge, 38, also notes that Joachim quotes a passage of Augustine in the abbreviated form supplied by Peter Lombard, Sententiae I, d. 8, c. 8, ed. Brady, vol. 1, 102, a further sign of the attention with which Joachim studied Peter Lombard.

⁸³ Godfrey of St-Victor, Miraculosus, ed. P. Delhaye, Dactylot, Lille 1991; Id., Fons philosophiae, ed. P. Michaux-Quenir, Namur 1996 (Analecta mediaevalia Namurcensia, 8); see E.A. Synn, The Fountain of Philosophy: a Translation of the Twelfth-century Fons philosophiae of Godfrey of Saint Victor, Pontifical Institute of Medieval Studies, Toronto 1972.

⁸⁴ J. W. Baldwin, The Intellectual Preparation for the Canon of 1215 against Ordals, Episcopatum, 36 (1961), 613-656.

Pope in 1198. Lothar spent up to ten years in Paris, from the mid 1170s to the mid 1180s, studying with such eminent scholars as Peter of Poitiers and Peter of Corbeil.⁸⁵ There, he studied the foundational disciplines of grammar, dialectic and rhetoric, as well as the emerging field of moral theology as taught at the cathedral school by Peter the Chanter. Innocent could not have avoided the controversies that pitted the crude rhetoric of Walter of St-Victor against the semantic subtleties of the disciples of Peter Lombard. With the death of Richard of St-Victor in 1173, a new set of theologians, schooled in the Sentences of Peter Lombard, were offering a new intellectual system in which the emphasis was more firmly placed on the analysis of propositions than on spiritual contemplation leading from the visible to the invisible world.

At Notre-Dame, semantic analysis had become a normal feature of theological and exegetical argument. It had become standard to distinguish between the signification of a term, deriving from its prima positio, and its supposition in a specific case. Under Lombard's influence and even more of Peter of Poitiers, semantic concerns became increasingly important in discussion of the Trinity.⁸⁶ Stephen Langton went further in these concerns, affirming that while one could say "God from God" as relating to Person, the noun essentia could only refer to divine essence and thus one could not say essence begot essence.⁸⁷ One of the masters of this school,

85. J. C. Moore, Pope Innocent III (1160/61-1210). To root up and to plant, Brill, Leiden 2003, 8-9. Moore has an excellent bibliography of works concerning Innocent's life and times. For a general introduction, see Pope Innocent III and his World, ed. J. C. Moore, B. Bolton, J. M. Powell and C. M. Rousseau, Ashgate Publishing, Farnham, UK 1999. On Innocent III's relationship with the schools, see J. W. Baldwin, Masters, Princes, and Merchants: The Social Views of Peter the Chanter and His Circle, 2 vols. Princeton University Press, Princeton 1970.

86. L. Valente, Logique et théologie. Les écoles parisiennes entre 1150 et 1220, Vrin, Paris 2008, esp. 173-182 on Peter Lombard and Peter of Poitiers.

87. Quoted by F. Robb, A Late Thirteenth-Century Attack on the Fourth Lateran Council: The «Liber Contra Lombardum» and Contemporary Debates on the Trinity, Arch. Theol. Anc. Méd., 62 (1995), 110-14, at 128. Langton's account of the statement "Good from God" (Deum de Deo) has been analysed more recently by R. Quinto (Stephen Langton, in Ph. W. Rosemann [ed.], Medieval Commentaries on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, vol. II, Brill, Leiden 2010, 35-78, in particular 64-66).

Peter the Chanter also focused on the use of dialectical reasoning to answer moral problems, providing modes of argumentation and case-studies that would be useful examples for the preacher. The theologians of the school of the Chanter were not only concerned with the high-theory of the Trinity or the Eucharist, but also worried about issues of sacramental and moral integrity, namely how the Church and individual could combine to produce a saved soul.⁸⁸ The school of Notre-Dame in this period combined a foundation in semantic analysis with a concern for the pastoral.

A number of these men of the school of Peter the Chanter became Innocent's foremost advisers, in particular Robert de Courson and Stephen Langton. They worked closely with him in reformulating church policy on the interdict and ordeals. In this way, their pastoral program found support in the highest quarters in Rome. They provided Innocent III, in many cases, with the theological firmament on which his ambitions might be justified. Although the Chanter and his disciples had made significant departures from Peter Lombard in terms of the content of his inquiries, they remained – in orientation and location – firmly of his school. They built on his systematisation towards protocols and practices of applied theology. That is, they applied the method evinced most famously and influentially in the Sentences towards the construction of a new body of church legislation.

Their influence can be seen at work in language of Lateran IV, which as we have already shown demonstrated very particular knowledge of the history of Christian doctrine. For the papacy to confess anum Petro, to cite precisely the passage of the Sentences identified by Joachim as marking a subtle, but distinct departure from Augustine was to do much more than clarify a point. Both the pun – cum Petro – and the particular endorsement of Peter Lombard's rewording of Augustine's definition of divine substance as una summa quaedam res, was to declare a new era in the making of Christian doctrine. The architect of this era was clearly endorsed as Peter Lombard. Read in this way, Lateran IV was a decisive intervention in debates that challenged the reputation of Peter Lombard and his master work.

88. The most important work on the Chanter remains Baldwin's Peter the Chanter (n. 85 above). In addition, Baldwin has published the aforementioned Paris et Rome en 1215: les réformes du IV^e Concile de Latran, Journal des Savants, (1997), 99-124, concentrating closely on the role of the schoolmen as advisors to the Pope.

CONCLUSION

As we have seen, when the Council confessed cum Petro, it confessed also to a «certain one supreme reality ... which alone is the principle of all things, besides which no other principle can be found». The Council gave particular authority to Lombard's concept of the una quaedam summa res, itself inspired by a phrase of Augustine in the De doctrina Christiana, but also endorsed the distinction Lombard wished to draw between this supreme reality and the three divine persons. Joachim was a careful reader of theology. He identified precisely the passage in which Peter Lombard had silently omitted Augustine's reference in that work to the three persons as plural things. In making this distinction, Peter Lombard was aware of the criticism that Peter Abelard had made against Albinus of Reims regarding the need to distinguish divine essence from divine person. Considered in this light, Lateran IV can be taken as an intervention into one of the key questions of the preceding century: how appropriate was the application of the rules of human logic to divine names? From Berengar onwards, this was the central issue that circled around the schools and caused ink to be spilt, reputations to be jeopardised and genuine enmity to be expressed. At St-Victor, the death of Hugh of St-Victor in 1141 had opened the way to a host of different personalities, each of whom sought to create their own theological synthesis, structured around the notion of a transcendent wisdom that could be accessed through the material world. Peter Lombard, himself a product of its public school, was one of a number of figures who sought to bring together the teaching of Hugh of St-Victor with the more analytic tradition espoused by Peter Abelard. Few theologians agreed with each other about the way a terminological focus could best be combined with the language of spiritual experience. With the advent of Achard of Saint-Victor as its abbot (1155-1160), and then the rise to prominence of Richard of Saint-Victor (d. 1173), Peter Lombard was seen by some Augustinian carious as having betrayed orthodox tradition, in the same way as Bernard of Clairvaux was troubled by the arguments of both Abelard and Gilbert of Poitiers.

While Achard of St-Victor had raised criticisms of Lombard's Christology, it was Richard of St-Victor in his De trinitate who supplied the most potent critique of the Trinitarian theology espoused in the first book of the Sentences. For Richard, a dialectical approach to theology only served to lead towards spiritual apprehension of a divine mystery. Joachim of Fiore was preacher and theologian. His intellectual debt to the writings of Richard of Saint-Victor deserves further study. Richard's influence would continue to exercise a profound influence in the thirteenth century, notably the anonymous author of a treatise Contra Lombardum once mistakenly associated with the school of Joachim of Fiore. For this author, Richard of St-Victor was an important voice continuing to assert that divine essence could indeed generate essence in each of the persons of the Trinity.⁸⁹ In their different ways, Richard, Peter Lombard and Joachim himself were all contesting the legacy of Augustine.

Yet the injunction of Lateran IV, with its explicit support for Peter Lombard against the criticisms of his Trinitarian theology formulated by Joachim of Fiore, was of huge influence in articulating a new vision of orthodoxy in the thirteenth century. It did not condemn the ideas of Richard of Saint-Victor, but it marked the end of a period of great diversity about how one might explain the Trinity. Peter Lombard, Richard of Saint-Victor and Joachim of Fiore were all sophisticated theologians who came up with their own way of presenting the core of Christian doctrine. They competed with each other as to who could present the Trinity most successfully. Those nurtured by the teaching of Richard of St-Victor and Joachim of Fiore about the spiritual realities articulated in theological discourse were suspicious of the distinction Lombard made between divine essence and the three persons of the Trinity and his vision of God as a summa quaedam res, a formula derived from a remark of Augustine. Nonetheless, their criticisms did not stop Peter Lombard's definition from gaining official recognition. The Fourth Lateran Council confirmed his authority, and ushered in a new era in the development of scholasticism.

⁸⁹ Joachimi abbas Liber contra Lombardum (Sinola di Gioacchino da Fiore), ed. C. Ottaviano, Reale Accademia d'Italia, Roma 1924 (Reale Accademia d'Italia, Studi e documenti, 8). On this work, see the arguments of Fiona Robb that it may have been written in the 1280s in response to the arguments of Peter John Olivi, for which Richard of St-Victor was also a key thinker: F. Robb, A Late Thirteenth-Century Attack on the Fourth Lateran Council (n. 87 above), 110-144.

MARK CLARK

PETER COMESTOR AND STEPHEN LANGTON:
MASTER AND STUDENT AND CO-MAKERS OF THE HISTORIA SCHOLASTICA

The standard chronology of the beginnings of Stephen Langton's long and distinguished career as a teacher of theology in Paris has been that of Maurice Powicke who, writing in 1928, first estimated that Langton began his studies in Paris around 1180.¹ Soon thereafter, however, in an article published in 1930, George Lacombe, citing a passage in Langton's first commentary on the Historia scholastica that indicated Langton's ignorance of the fall of Jerusalem in 1187, concluded that Langton had lectured on the History sometime before 1187.² Powicke, relying upon Lacombe's research and also upon Beryl Sralley's findings that a number of Langton's Old Testament commentaries predated 1190, revised his original estimate accordingly. Quoting the De vitis illustribus for evidence that Langton had first taught on the arts faculty before becoming the leader of the theology faculty («liberalium artium scolis prefuit, inde theologicæ scolæ presidens, theologiam celeberrime docuit»), Powicke wrote of Langton: «If he taught theology after 1180 he must have come to Paris about 1170 ... On the whole, I am disposed to push back the date of Langton's birth and to add ten or twelve years to his life in Paris ... Stephen, if he went to Paris about 1170 or a little earlier, could not have been born be-

1. E.M. Powicke, Stephen Langton: being the 170th Lectures delivered in the University of Oxford in Hilary Term 1927, Oxford University Press, Oxford 1928 (repr. Methuen, London 1965), 30.

2. G. Lacombe, Studies on the Commentaries of Cardinal Stephen Langton, Part I, Arch. Hist. Doctr. Litt. M. A., 5 (1930), 21-23.