

VIATOR

MEDIEVAL AND RENAISSANCE STUDIES

Volume 34 (2003)

PUBLISHED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF
THE CENTER FOR MEDIEVAL AND RENAISSANCE STUDIES
UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, LOS ANGELES

BREPOLS

JOACHIM OF FIORE AND THE DIVISION OF CHRISTENDOM

by Brett Edward Whalen

Over fifteen years after its publication, R. I. Moore's The Formation of a Persecuting Society continues to elicit the scrutiny and response of scholars.¹ In this provocative book, Moore argues that western Europe developed into a "persecuting society" during the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, when the period's rapidly expanding political and ecclesiastical institutions took shape through the suppression of groups defined as deviant or threatening. Among others, Jews and heretics bore the onus of this shift toward intolerance among those wielding the machinery to identify, to oppress, and, in some cases, to destroy minority communities. In his recent work The First European Revolution, Moore returns to this emergence of a "ruling culture" in the West, one that sought "the denigration of alternative sources of intellectual authority and cultural prestige, both Christian and non-Christian."² With respect to the former, he identifies members of the Eastern Greek Church as "the obvious alternative" to the nascent Latin literati. Building upon his earlier thesis, Moore brings Greeks to the table with Jews, heretics, and other groups whose deteriorating status was contingent upon internal transformations in Western society and government.

In this case, Moore adds a new twist to a long-standing argument that the eleventh to the thirteenth century (more specifically, 1054 to 1204) was a period of dramatic deterioration in the relationship between Latins and Greeks, whose slow cultural estrangement was suddenly acerbated by the ambitions of the reform papacy and above all by the crusades.³ The latter position is readily summed up in colorful statements like "the crusaders brought not peace but the sword, and the sword was to sever Christendom,"⁴ or "in the end, schism and antagonism were the true harvest of the

I would like to thank Philippe Buc and Kathryn Miller of Stanford University, Robert Lerner of Northwestern University, Holly A. Case, Jehangir Malegam, and Jay Rubenstein, of the University of New Mexico at Albuquerque, along with the participants at the California Medieval History Seminar (held at the Huntington Library, Pasadena, 9 April 2002), for providing feedback to this essay at various stages in its development.

¹R. I. Moore, The Formation of a Persecuting Society (Oxford 1987).

²R. I. Moore, The First European Revolution (Oxford 2001) 146.

³With caveats about its status as a non-event, 1054 still marks the nominal origin of the ecclesiastical schism; 1204 is the year when the Latin armies of the Fourth Crusade sacked Constantinople. For standard treatments of the schism, see S. Runciman, The Eastern Schism: A Study of the Papacy and the Eastern Churches during the XIIth and XIIIth Centuries (Oxford 1955); R. Mayne, "East and West in 1054," Cambridge Historical Review 9 (1954) 133–148; F. Dvornik, Byzantium and the Papacy (New York 1964); A. Papadakis, The Christian East and the Rise of the Papacy (Crestwood, NY 1994); and J. Meyendorff, "Rome and Constantinople" in Rome, Constantinople, Moscow: Historical and Theological Studies (Crestwood, NY 1996) 7–26. "Estrangement" is a term popularized in this context by Y. Congar, L'ecclésiologie du haut Moyen-Age (Paris 1968) 376.

⁴Runciman, Eastern Schism (n. 3 above) 101.

crusades.”⁵ In The Making of Europe, reinforcing this evaluation of the split between the two churches, Robert Bartlett posits a connection between the formation of a distinctly “Western” or “Latin” Christian identity and this growing state of alienation between Rome and the Eastern Church.⁶ According to Bartlett, the very notion of Latin Christendom was brought into focus by Western antagonism toward the Greeks, ecclesiastical rivals which the expansive Roman Church was encountering in eastern Europe, the Balkans, and the Mediterranean. “New levels of contiguity,” he writes in reference to the period ca. 1050 to 1250, “and a new intensity of hatred and suspicion had made Latins more Latin and Greeks more Greek.”⁷

Moore’s extension of the “persecuting society” model to include the members of the Eastern Church dovetails nicely with this dominant view of the relationship between Latins and Greeks during the period of the crusades. Many historians, however, have expressed their reservations about the totalizing nature of his thesis.⁸ Robert Lerner is one such critic who focuses in The Feast of Saint Abraham on the eschatological representation of the Jews found in the apocalyptic writings of the famous Calabrian abbot Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202).⁹ According to Lerner, Joachim offered the “novel proposition that at the end of time the world will be transformed into a mutually beneficial union of Christians and Jews.”¹⁰ Lerner proceeds to trace the influence of this idea upon apocalyptic thinkers into the fifteenth century, a line of investigation that leads him to qualify Moore’s argument. While he does not doubt that medieval society took a turn toward the more systematic persecution of minorities, Lerner feels it is critical to recognize the “alternatives and paths not taken,” including Joachim’s argument that Jews and Christians would join harmoniously at the end of time.¹¹

According to Joachim of Fiore, that irenic union of church and synagogue would be preceded by the reunion of the estranged Latin and Greek Churches, forming part of the same eschatological vision which has led Lerner to proclaim that the Calabrian abbot and his devotees “stood for an alternative to the formation of a persecuting society.”¹² How did Joachim understand the division of Christendom, theoretically a universal body of believers, into a Western Church (ecclesia occidentalis) of Latins centered on Rome and an Eastern Church (ecclesia orientalis) of Greeks centered on Constantinople? Surprisingly, the extensive scholarship on the abbot has yet to explore how he treated this problem, despite its prominence in his writings.¹³ The question of ⁵Papadakis, Christian East (n. 3 above) 89.

⁶R. Bartlett, Making of Europe: Conquest, Colonization and Cultural Change, 1050–1250 (Oxford 1993) 250–254.

⁷Bartlett, Making of Europe (n. 6 above) 255.

⁸See the introduction to Beyond the Persecuting Society: Religious Toleration Before the Enlightenment, ed. J. Laursen and C. Nederman (Philadelphia 1998) 13–24. For additional criticisms of the “persecuting society” model, see the comments of D. Nirenberg, Communities of Violence (Princeton 1996) 242–243; and A. Abulafia, Christians and Jews in the Twelfth-Century Renaissance (London 1995) 2–5, 135.

⁹R. Lerner, The Feast of Saint Abraham: Medieval Millenarians and the Jews (Philadelphia 2001).

¹⁰Lerner, Feast of Saint Abraham (n. 9 above) 24.

¹¹Lerner, Feast of Saint Abraham (n. 9 above) 1.

¹²Lerner, Feast of Saint Abraham (n. 9 above) 121: “If this book has served any larger purpose it has been to counter any comfortable assumptions that all medieval Christians thought alike about their Jewish neighbors. Granted that the Joachite millennialists were not tolerationists, they nonetheless stood for an alternative to the formation of a persecuting society.”

¹³To the best of my knowledge, there has not been an article or monograph exclusively devoted to how Latin and Greek difference was represented in Western exegesis and apocalypticism, Joachite or otherwise, has fallen well outside of the traditional scholarship on the ecclesiastical schism, focused either on the specific points of religious contention between the two churches or on the "real" reasons for their lamentable sundering.¹⁴

Through his inspired reading of Scripture, Joachim arrived at the conclusion that the divergence of Latins and Greeks was a providential event, leading toward the future fulfillment of God's dispensation within the Latin Church, which had come to enjoy a place of primacy in salvation history formerly reserved for the Jews and then for the Greeks. Although the Greeks were the first Gentiles to receive God's word and the originators of the monastic tradition, they had fallen into a state of schism from Rome and rejected its teachings, including the doctrine of the Holy Spirit's dual procession from both the Father and the Son (filioque).¹⁵ On this account the Greek Church was divinely punished by the Saracen invasions of the eastern Roman Empire. The abbot consistently demonstrated his belief, however, that the Greeks would be restored to unity of the Roman faith by a monastic order of the Latin Church, which would face its own share of tribulations during the time of Antichrist. In these terms, his sophisticated vision of Latin and Greek difference does not fit neatly into any presentation of the schism that reduces its players to a state of coldly calculated intolerance, antagonism, or irrational hatred.

Nonetheless, Joachim's theology of history does present us with an innovative and influential vision of the Latin Christian community, understood as distinct from that of the Eastern Church. His awareness of this Latin identity was more than a simple product of growing alienation from the Greeks. Like his clerical contemporaries, the Calabrian abbot lived and wrote during a time of dynamic transformation in the ecclesiastical culture of the Roman Church, which resonated with a variety of opinions about the historical significance and proper ordering of Christian religious life. These debates were part of the same changing environment that has been identified by Robert Bartlett and others with the creation and expansion of Latin Christendom, newly united through its shared sacred language, common liturgy, and theoretical obedience to Rome.¹⁶ The presentation of Christendom's division offered by Joachim of Joachim's treatment of the relationship between the Latin and Greek Churches. One of the more detailed descriptions of his exegesis in this regard is found in A.-D. v. den Brincken, Die "Nationes Christianorum Orientalium" im Verständnis der Lateinischen Historiographie (Cologne 1973) 32–34. See also H. de Lubac, La postérité spirituelle de Joachim of Fiore (Paris 1978) 36–38.

¹⁴For a penetrating criticism of the general historiography of the schism, see T. Kolbaba, The Byzantine Lists: Errors of the Latins (Chicago 2000) 1–7; as well as her comments in T. Kolbaba, "Byzantine Perceptions of Latin Religious 'Errors': Themes and Changes from 850 to 1350" in A. E. Laiou and R. P. Mottahedeh, eds., The Crusades from the Perspective of Byzantium and the Muslim World (Washington, DC 2001) 117–143. For a critique of models in which historians are eager to find signs of anti-Greek sentiment in the West pointing in the direction of the Fourth Crusade, see T. Madden, "Outside and Inside the Fourth Crusade," International History Review 17 (1995) 726–743.

¹⁵*Filioque* (i.e. "and the Son") was a Latin addition to the creed established at Niceae (325) and Constantinople (381), indicating that the Holy Spirit proceeded from both the Father and the Son, rather than from the Father alone. This modification of the creed was deemed illicit by the Greek Church. See J.-P. Batut, "Le Filioque, pomme de discorde entre l'Orient et l'Occident?," Revue des Études Slaves 68 (1996) 385–398.

¹⁶For similar definitions of "Latin Christendom" during the period in question, see the comments of D. Sheerin, "In Media Latinitate," Helios 14 (1987) 51–67; with the response to Sheerin by R. Hexter, "Latinitas in the Middle Ages: Horizons and Perspectives," Helios 14 (1987) 69–92; as well as B. Ander-

Fiore suggests some of the ways that Latin models of salvation history played their own role in the formation of Western Christian identity during a period associated with the premodern "making of Europe."

At this point, after many decades of modern scholarship on the Calabrian abbot, the general course of his career and basic outlines of his thought are well known.¹⁷ Joachim laid the groundwork for his theology of history in the first four books of the Liber de concordia novi et veteris testamenti, a work he started around the year 1183 and revised over the following decades.¹⁸ The Liber de concordia established his hallmark model of history based on the Trinity, dividing time into an age or status of the Father, from Adam to Christ; a status of the Son, starting with Christ and continuing to the abbot's present; and a status of the Holy Spirit, a terrestrial age of spiritual perfection that would bloom after the imminent completion of the second age. Joachim referred to this tertiary pattern as the prima diffinitio. The key to uncovering the prima diffinitio, however, lay in the secunda diffinitio, the concordance of history's two tempora, the temporum of the Old Testament from Adam to Christ and the temporum of the New Testament from Christ to the end of time.¹⁹ These were not alternate patterns: the "spiritual understanding" of the prima diffinitio emerged from this careful concordance of the two tempora.²⁰

By reading the course of salvation through the lens of the prima and secunda diffinitiones, Joachim had uncovered a template for interpreting post-biblical history within the sacred text of the Bible itself. He was hardly alone, however, in his effort to discern patterns of divine order in the course of history after the Incarnation. The twelfth century is widely recognized as a dynamic period in Latin historiography, marked by new eagerness among ecclesiastical authors to part ways from the "historical agnosticism" of Saint Augustine, who had maintained that the period after Christ was indivisible and unknowable as part of God's plan.²¹ This innovative spirit of inquiry into Heilsgeschichte expressed itself in a variety of forms.²² Among its practitioson, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism (1983; London 1991) 12–19; and J. R. S. Philips, The Medieval Expansion of Europe (Oxford 1988).

¹⁷For a brief biography of Joachim and survey of his basic patterns of history, see M. Reeves, The Influence of Prophecy in the Middle Ages (1969; Notre Dame 1993); M. Reeves, Joachim of Fiore and the Prophetic Future (New York 1976); and B. McGinn, The Calabrian Abbot (New York 1985). Important sources for the abbot's career are the near contemporary vitae edited by H. Grundmann, "Zur Biographie Joachims von Fiore und Raniers von Ponza," Deutsches Archiv für Erforschung des Mittelalters 16 (1960) 437–545.

¹⁸The first four books of the Concordia are edited by E. R. Daniel, Joachim of Fiore: Liber de concordia novi et veteris testamenti, American Philosophy Society 73 (Philadelphia 1983). Book five is available in a reprint of the 1519 Venetian edition, Concordia novi et veteris testamenti (1519; Frankfurt 1964). Citations of the Concordia books one through four will follow Daniel's edition by page numbers, with the corresponding folios from the Venetian edition in parentheses.

¹⁹*Liber de concordia* 62 (fol. 7r–v).

²⁰Joachim, Liber de concordia 80 (fol. 10r), likens the secunda diffinitio to the letter omega, in which one virgula (the spiritual understanding) proceeds from the middle of the dual tempora.

²¹After some equivocation, Augustine maintained that history after Christ was part of an undifferentiated "sixth age," to be followed by a seventh, ahistorical Sabbath. On Augustine's "historical agnosticism," see R. Markus, Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine (Cambridge 1970).

²²On this twelfth-century transformation in historical thinking, see M.-D. Chenu, Nature, Man and Society in the Twelfth Century, trans. J. Taylor and L. Little (Chicago 1968) 162–201; R. Southern, "Aspects of the European Tradition of Historical Writings," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 5th series (London 1971) 21.159–179, 22.159–180; P. Classen, "Res Gestae, Universal History, Apocalypse: Visions ners, Rupert of Deutz (d. 1129), Honorius Augustodunensis (d. 1140), Gerhoh of Reichersberg (d. 1169), and Anselm of Havelberg (d. 1158) are figures frequently mentioned alongside the Calabrian abbot, who is seen as the marquis figure among such speculative thinkers.²³ The historical schemes produced by these clergymen, including Joachim's representation of the Greek and Latin Churches, employed a number of methods to periodize biblical and post-biblical events, many of which were recycled from patristic models of Christian history.

The latter included a division of time into seven ages, matching the seven days of creation, as well as into three ages, before the Jewish law (ante legem), under the law (sub lege), and under Christian grace (sub gratia).²⁴ Another popular arrangement, inspired by the first four seals of the Apocalypse, was to divide ecclesiastical history into a series of persecutions: first, the primitive church was persecuted by the Jews; second, the church of the martyrs by the pagans (through the course of ten persecutions, matching the ten plagues of Egypt); third, the Constantinian church by internal heretics; and fourth, the contemporary church by false brothers.²⁵ Yet another pervasive concept was that of translatio imperii, the "translation of empire," inspired by Daniel 2.20–45.²⁶ According to this scheme in its late antique form, history was marked by the migrations of imperial power, which had come to rest among the Romans, where it would remain until the end of time. By the twelfth century, however, Latin exegetes and chroniclers were increasingly certain that imperium Romanum itself had stayed on the move, transferred by Constantine to Byzantium, from Constantinople to the Carolingian Franks, and from the Franks to the emperors of Germany.

This new spirit of historical speculation also inspired attempts to use the narrative of the Old Testament, that "vast palimpsest capable of revealing the thread of universal history," as a sort of grid for interpreting post-biblical events.²⁷ Again, this basic mode of exegesis, underpinning Joachim's secunda diffinitio, had its own patristic antecedents but was given a new lease on life during the twelfth century. Rupert of Deutz suggested such a scheme in the closing pages of his liturgical commentary the Liber de diviniis officiis (ca. 1110).²⁸ In the course of the nightly readings after Pente-of Past and Future," Renaissance and Renewal in the Twelfth Century, ed. R. L. Benson and G. Constable (Cambridge, MA 1982) 387–417; and A. Funkenstein, Theology and the Scientific Imagination (Princeton 1986) 243–271.

²³On Joachim's place among twelfth-century historians, in addition to the works above (n. 20), see M. Reeves, "The Originality and Influence of Joachim of Fiore," Traditio 36 (1980) 269–316; R. Lerner, "Refreshment of the Saints: The Time after Antichrist as a Station for Earthly Progress in Medieval Thought," Traditio 32 (1976) 97–144; and H. de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale, vol. 1, pt. 2 (Paris 1961) 484–504.

²⁴For a survey of Christian historical schemes from the primitive church to Augustine, see A. Luneau, Histoire du Salut chez les Pères de l'Église: La Doctrine des âges du monde (Paris 1964); and W. Kinzig, "The Idea of Progress in the Early Church until the Age of Constantine," Studia Patristica 24 (1993) 119–134.

²⁵On this scheme, see W. Kamlah, Apokalypse und Geschichtstheologie: Die mittelalterliche Auslegung der Apokalypse vor Joachim von Fiore (1935; Vaduz 1965) 57–74. The "ten persecutions" model was popularized in the Latin West by Orosius, despite the fact that his own teacher, Augustine, dismissed it.

²⁶See W. Goetz, Translatio Imperii: Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Geschichtsdenkens und der politischen Theorien im Mittelalters und in der frühen Neuzeit (Tübingen 1958); and M. Chazan, L'empire et l'histoire universelle (Paris 1999).

²⁷R. Southern Scholastic Humanism and the Unification of Europe (Oxford 1995) 116–117.

²⁸Rupert of Deutz, Liber de divinis officiis, ed. H. Haacke, CCCM 7 (Turnhout 1967). On Rupert's theology of history, see G. Bischoff, "Early Premonstratensian Eschatology: The Apocalyptic Myth" in The cost, he notes, one could see designated the times of the holy church: The rejection of Saul and triumph of David designated the rejection of idolatry and the triumph of the church over the Roman empire, while the subsequent split between Israel and Judah designated the division of the victorious church into false brothers and true believers.²⁹ Honorius Augustodunensis offered a similar reading of the Old Testament's historical books in the closing chapters of his Gemma animae (ca. 1111).³⁰ Taking the Sunday readings after Pentecost as his guide, Honorius interpreted events under the Jewish law (sub lege) as corresponding with events in the period of Christian grace (sub gratia): On the sixth Sunday after Pentecost, for example, he connected the coronation of Solomon (sub lege) with the conversion of Constantine (sub gratia); on the eighth Sunday, the building of the Temple with the council of Nicaea; and on the twelfth Sunday, the division of Israel and Judah with the division of church by heresies.³¹

Although these schemes of Rupert and Honorius bear a remarkable similarity to Joachim of Fiore's secunda diffinitio, they have been relatively neglected by scholars, perhaps because modern historians have shown a consistent preoccupation with Joachim's prima diffinitio and idea of the third status.³² This focus on the latter idea is due in large part to the heretical conclusions certain thirteenth-century thinkers drew from it, namely that the terrestrial age of spiritual perfection would mean an end to the institutional church. In this approach, however, scholars of the abbot often underestimate how the secunda diffinitio revolutionized his view of post-biblical history, breathing new life into ideas like the translation of empire or the division of ecclesiastical history according to seals of the Apocalypse. This model of exegesis was of particular importance for how he understood the relationship between the Greek and Latin Churches.³³

Through his careful and detailed concordance of the Old Testament temporum with Spirituality of Western Christendom, ed. E. F. Elder (Kalamazoo, MI 1976) 41–71; Classen, "Res Gestae" (n. 22 above) 404–407; and J. Van Engen, Rupert of Deutz (Berkeley 1983) 81–94.

²⁹Rupert, Liber de diviniis officiis (n. 28 above) 417–119. Rupert's historical schemes are well known for their emphasis on the role of the Trinity in salvation, particularly that of the Holy Spirit in the age after the Incarnation. In addition to the works cited above (nn. 20–21), see W. Beinert, Die Kirche-Gottes Heil in der Welt: Die Lehre von der Kirche nach den Schriften des Rupert von Deutz, Honorius Augustodunensis und Gerhoh von Reichersberg, ein Beitrag zur Ekklesiologie des 12. Jahrhunderts (Münster 1973) 322–326, who provides a chart of Rupert's periodization of post-biblical history based on the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit. The trope of Israel and Judah's division as broadly representing the division of the church into heretics and orthodox believers dates back to the patristic period.

³⁰Honorius Augustodunensis, Gemma animae, PL 172.689–738. On Honorius's views of history, see Reeves, "Originality of Joachim" (n. 23 above) 277–279; Beinert, Die Kirche-Gotte (n. 29 above) 326–331; and Lerner, "Refreshment of the Saints" (n. 23 above) 110–112; along with V. I. J. Flint, "World History in the Early Twelfth Century: the 'Imago Mundi' of Honorius Augustodunensis" in R. H. C. Davis, ed., The Writing of History in the Middle Ages (Oxford 1981) 211–238.

³¹Honorius, Gemma animae, PL 172.704–726, continues this scheme until the twenty-fifth Sunday after Pentecost, the persecutions in the book of Maccabees (sub lege) and the coming of Antichrist (sub gratia).

³²Rupert and Honorius are well known among scholars interested in twelfth-century theology of history and possible antecedents for Joachim's historical schemes (see above, nn. 20–21, 27–28), but their use of the Old Testament as a template for post-biblical history (as suggested by Rupert and carried out in great detail by Honorius) has been apparently overlooked. This suggests that further inquiry into possible antecedents for Joachim's secunda diffinitio would be worthwhile.

³³As pointed out by Daniel, Liber de concordia (n. 18 above) xxii–xxv, scholars often underestimate the importance of Joachim's secunda diffinitio for his projection of the eschatological third status, a problem also appreciated by Lerner, Feast of Saint Abraham (n. 9 above) 3, who notes that the abbot's "principle of concordance" was an equally inspired method of exegesis as the prima diffinitio.

the temporum of the New Testament, the abbot discerned that the biblical division of Israel and Juda did not simply prefigure a vague division of the church into orthodox and unorthodox communities (as argued, for example, by Rupert and Honorius), but rather corresponded in a concrete manner to the schism between the Greeks and the Latins. Joachim makes this connection clear in the second book of his Liber de concordia:

Just as the sons of Juda reigned in Jerusalem from David until the Babylonian transmigration, so the successors of Peter secured the regal priesthood in the church of God from the days of Saint Sylvester until the present, particularly over the Latins, who truly are accounted among the sons of Juda, as the churches of the Greeks are among tribes of Israel. However, just as the ten tribes were sundered from the house of Juda not long after David, establishing for themselves Jeroboam of the tribe of Ephraim as their leader, not long after Saint Sylvester the Greek churches began to separate from the church of Peter, establishing for themselves the bishop of Constantinople as their leader and walking in their errors up until the end.³⁴

Saint Sylvester (d. 335), of course, was the Roman pontiff famous for his apocryphal conversion of Constantine (d. 337), first Christian Roman emperor and founder of Constantinople.³⁵ Joachim returns to this model at several other points in the Liber de concordia. In the third book, equating the seven generalia bella of the Hebrews with the seven seals of the Apocalypse, the abbot places the division between the Latins and Greeks under the third seal, which matched the period from King David until the Assyrian conquest of the ten tribes of Israel. According to the abbot, it was at this point that the “new Jerusalem, namely the church of Peter, was crowned with the royal dignity, in the same manner as the old Jerusalem in the tribe of Juda in the days of David.”³⁶ Not long after, however, like the schismatic kingdom of Israel, by the hidden judgment of God (occulto dei iudicio) the Greeks “were sundered many times from the Latin Church, abandoning the house of Peter and his successors, and establishing the bishop of Constantinople as their head.”³⁷

In the fourth book of the Liber de concordia, offering a generation-by-generation concordance of the two tempora, he presents the division of Israel and Juda during the fourteenth generation after Jacob, when the ten tribes “gathered the people’s multitude” (congregata multitudine populi) and elevated (sublimaretur) Samaria to the

³⁴*Liber de concordia* 135–136 (fol. 17v): “Ut autem a David usque ad transmigrationem Babilonis regnauerunt filii Iude in Iherusalem, ita diebus sancti Silvestri pape usque ad presens optinuerunt successores Petre regale sacerdotium in ecclesia dei, maxime super Latinos qui vero filios Iude reputati sunt, sicut et Grecorum ecclesie in tribus Israel. Ut autem non longe post David divide sunt decem tribus a domo Iude, constituentes sibi caput Ieroboam in tribu Ephraim, ita non longe post beatum Silvestrum ceperunt separari ecclesie Grecorum ab ecclesia Petri, constituentes sibi caput Constantinopolitanum episcopum ambulantes usque ad finem in erroribus suis.”

³⁵On the importance of Constantine in eleventh- and twelfth-century Latin historiography and polemics, see H. E. J. Cowdrey, “Eleventh-Century Reformers’ Views of Constantine” in L. Garland, ed., Conformity and Non-Conformity in Byzantium (Amsterdam 1997) 63–91.

³⁶*Liber de concordia* 289–290 (fol. 39r): “Illa nova Iherusalem, ecclesia scilicet Petri, regali est coronata fastigio, quemadmodum et vetus illa Iherusalem in tribu Iuda in diebus David.”

³⁷*Liber de concordia* 289–292 (fols. 39r–v): “Sicut autem illo tempore separate sunt decem tribus a domo Iuda, ita et nunc occulto dei iudicio actum est, ut Grecorum ecclesie scinderentur multipliciter a Latina, deserentes domum Petri et successorum eius et constituentes sibi caput Constantinopolitanum episcopum.”

kingship against the will of Judah's king (invito rege Iuda). This corresponded to the schism of the Greek and Latin Churches during the fourteenth generation after Christ, when a synod was convened (congregata est synodus) in Constantinople under the emperor Theodosius (379–395) and, against the will of the Roman legates (invitis et renitentibus Romane ecclesie legatis), the bishops there assembled elevated (sublimauerunt) the see of Constantinople to the dignity of a patriarchate.³⁸ From this point, Joachim asserts, like the priests of Baal in Israel, the heretical bishops of Constantinople walked in their errors “away from the Roman Church, which is the place of prayer and the unyielding Temple of the living God.”³⁹

Based on his concordance of the two tempora, the abbot describes how the Roman Church was subsequently defiled at the hands of Arian barbarians like the Goths, who invaded the West at the bidding of Constantinople, in the same way that Juda was polluted by Israel's errors of idolatry. In the third book of the Liber de concordia, under the fourth seal of the Apocalypse, he explains that “the patronage of the Roman Church was removed from the emperors at Constantinople and bestowed upon Charles, ruler of the Franks, and his successors,” a translation of empire back to the West.⁴⁰ At this point, just as the Assyrians conquered Israel, the Saracens (in typo regni Assyriorum) arose and occupied the lands of the Eastern Church. The Greeks, Joachim asserts, had disregarded the mandates of Rome, had favored earthly rulers over the divine one, and had chosen heretical rather than catholic bishops. On this account, “by all-powerful God's just judgment” (iusto dei omnipotentis iudicio), they were given into the hands of the Saracens.⁴¹

Joachim reiterates these developments in his generation-by-generation concordance of the two tempora, as found in the fourth book of the Liber de Concordia. Under the twenty-second generation of the New Testament, corresponding to the rise of the Assyrians in the Old Testament, “God raised up the spirit of the king of the Arabs, who had descended from Moameth, the pseudo-prophet of the Saracens, by succession not so much in rule as in perfidy, and they first laid waste to the churches of Jerusalem, Antioch and Alexandria.”⁴² Like the wayward kings of Israel, the abbot asserts, the rulers of Constantinople had been allowed to walk in their errors until God raised up the Saracens and brought them to the gates of Constantinople, when the Eastern emperors failed in their imperial and ecclesiastical dignity.⁴³ At this point, he reaches the ³⁸A reference to the first council of Constantinople (381) that proclaimed the city's ecclesiastical position second only to Rome, considered an illegitimate innovation by the Roman Church.

³⁹*Liber de concordia* 337–338 (fol. 46r): “sic et ecclesie Grecorum, sequestrate per Constantinopolitanos episcopos, quorum aliquos fore constat magnos heresyarchas, a Romana ecclesia que est locus orationis et templum solidum dei vivi, ambulaverunt de reliquo in horroribus suis.”

⁴⁰*Liber de concordia* 296 (fols. 40r–v): “Circa quorum tempora inchoata est aperto quinti sigilli, ablato a Constantinopolitanis augustis Romane patrocinatus ecclesie et collato Karulo, Francorum principi, et successoribus eius.”

⁴¹*Liber de concordia* 296–300 (fol. 41r).

⁴²*Liber de concordia* 360 (fol. 49v): “suscitavit enim deus spiritum regis Arabum, qui per successionem non tam regni quam perfidie descenderat a Moameth, pseudo propheta Sarracenorum, et primo quidem deuastauerunt Iherosolimitanam, Anthiochenam, et Alexandrinam ecclesias.”

⁴³*Liber de concordia* 364 (fols. 49v–50r): “Huc usque perseueravit regnum Israel in loco suo. Deletum est autem sub sequenti generatione, sexto videlicet anno Ezechie regis Iude. Similiter augusti orientales usque ad consimilem generationem participes fuerunt Romani, immo ecclesiastici principatus, ita ut Romani imperatores dicerentur et essent. Ex hinc et regnum Israel, super quod aliquando regnauerat rex David sicut

twelve generations of the Old Testament that started with Hezekiah, the righteous king of Juda, to whose life the Lord added fifteen years with the promise of protection for Jerusalem. Why, Joachim asks, was it promised that the city of Jerusalem would be protected from the Assyrian kings, unless it was because the kings of the Assyrians had already captured the ten tribes and demolished them, and were threatening to do likewise to Jerusalem, just as was wrought upon the churches of the Greeks by the Saracens? For they were cut off from partaking of the Western empire by them, on account of the frequent wars and the anguish which they suffered unceasingly at their hands. Not without reason did all-powerful God promise protection to the house of Juda from the Assyrian kings, until the number of years added to Hezekiah were completed, just as the great frenzy of the Saracens was kept at bay, with the Lord warding off the devastation of the Latin people until the predetermined time that was designated in the fifteen years is completed.⁴⁴

As Joachim was well aware, the Assyrians did not just issue forth against the tribes of Israel at this time, but also plagued the kingdom of Juda. In like manner, the Saracens also beset the Latin Church, especially in parts of Africa and Spain that were conquered by the infidels. Clearly, however, there was a difference between the fates of the Greeks and Latins, as was the case with Israel and Juda, because the Assyrians carried off the multitude of the sons of Israel. The sons of Juda, while punished for a time on account of their sins, nevertheless were not permitted to be removed from their borders. So the very vast multitude of the Greeks mingled in the past with the Saracen people, and remain so until this day, to the point that they use their language and customs. It was not allowed that the Latins be absorbed, on account of the fact that the Lord protected the Latin Church from their fury, certainly for Christ's glory, "lest by chance they say among the nations 'where is their God?'"⁴⁵

The Calabrian abbot was not the first Latin clergyman who had confronted the historical relationship of Rome and Constantinople, nor was he unique in his effort to interpret their sometimes contentious relationship within a universal framework of ecclesiastical history.⁴⁶ His correspondence of Israel and Juda with the Greek and et super Iudam, desiit esse regnum, quia filii Israel qui elegerant sibi regem Ieroboam filium Nabath amoti sunt de suo loco; et imperium Grecorum quoad urbem Romanam desiit esse imperium quia 'atrium,' inquit Iohannes, 'quod est foris templum eice foras et ne metiris illud, quoniam datum est gentibus.'

⁴⁴*Liber de concordia* 366–367 (fols. 50r–v): "quare autem urbs Jerusalem protegenda promittitur a regibus Assyriorum, nisi quia reges Assyriorum iam ceperant decem tribus et demoliti fuerant eas et facere similia Iherusalem minabantur et quia simile aliquid actum est per Sarracenos in ecclesiis Grecorum? Seclusi sunt a participatione occidentalis imperii propter crebra bella et angustias quas passi sunt indesinenter ab eis. Non inconvenienter pollicetur deus omnipotens protectionem domui Iuda a regibus Assyriorum, donec compleatur numerus annorum additus Ezechie; quin nimirum rabies Sarracenorum a vastatione populi Latini, protegente domino, amota est, quousque compleatur tempus prefinitum quod designatum est in quindecim annis."

⁴⁵*Liber de concordia* 366–367 (fol. 50v): "neque Sarraceni contra solas ecclesias Grecorum, cum multas per eos ecclesias Latinorum, maxime in partibus Africe, eversas radicitus doleamus. Sed plane distat inter utrumque, quod multitudinem filiorum Israel transtulerunt Assyrii in terram suam. Filios autem Iuda etsi affligere ad horam pro reatibus suis, non sunt tamen eos a suis finibus amovere permisi. Sic maxima multitudo Grecorum commixta fuit quondam et est usque ad presens cum populo Sarracenorum, ita ut lingua eorum utantur et moribus. Latinos vero absorbere non sunt permisi, eo quod dominus protexerit Latinam ecclesiam a furore ipsorum, haud dubium quod pro gloria Christi sui, ne forte dicant in gentibus 'Ubi est deus eorum.'"

⁴⁶See, for example, the letter of Humbert of Silva Candida, Epistola C ad Michaelem, ed. C. Will, Acta

Latin Churches, however, elevated the division of Christendom to the stage of providential history in a dramatic and unprecedented fashion. From his vantage point in the late twelfth century, informed by the wondrous principle of concordance, Joachim perceived that Rome and its Latin followers had survived the machinations of heretical Greek emperors and patriarchs, as well as numerous trials at the hands of their minions, the Arian barbarians. By divine arrangement, imperium had been transferred to the Franks from the Greeks, who were sundered from the Latin Church and overwhelmed by the Saracens, while Rome was preserved as the living Temple of the Lord.

Does this sense of alienation from the Greeks mark Joachim as part of general shift among Western Christians toward intolerance and hatred for the non-Latin members of the Eastern Church, as one might assume from reading Moore, Bartlett, and others? There is no reason to assume that the abbot was isolated from the anti-Greek sentiment that was generated among some Latins by contemporary situations like the perceived failure of the Byzantine emperors to support the crusading endeavor.⁴⁷ Clearly, the abbot believed that the Latin Christian community of his own day had superseded the place of the Eastern Church in God's dispensation, much as the Gentiles had themselves superseded the Jews. His understanding of the difference between Greeks and Latins, however, was shaped and tempered by his contemplation of sacred history, rather than some sort of Latin Christian chauvinism. This becomes all the more evident when we shift our attention to Joachim's famous eschatological predictions of the prima diffinitio. Peering into the future, he saw that the division of Christendom was decidedly not the end of God's plan. Like the temporum of the Old Testament culminating in Christ, the temporum of the New Testament was setting the stage for a final act in the drama of salvation, the spiritual third status that would usher in the reunion of the Eastern Church with Rome. This return of the Greeks to the more spiritual Roman faith would be followed by the harmonious conversion of the Jews. Led by a special order of monks emerging from among the Latins, the remnant and finally the multitude of all three peoples—Latin, Greek and Jew—would be saved from the et scripta quae de controversiis ecclesiae Graecae et Latinae saeculo undecimo composita extant (Leipzig 1861), written in the name of Pope Leo IX during the infamous dispute between Rome and Constantinople in 1054. In a particularly striking passage, Humbert, 78, attributes the origin of the two churches' conflict to the period after the conversion of Constantine, when the Latin or Western Church (Latina vel Occidentalis ecclesia), triumphant but wearied from God's battle during the tenth and final persecution under Diocletian, was next beset by the heresiarchs of Constantinople. Nor was assigning apocalyptic roles specifically to Greeks and Westerners ("Franks") unprecedented: Writing ca. 950, Adso of Montier-en-Der, De ortu et tempore antichristi, ed. D. Verhelst (Turnholt 1976) 26, foretold that the Roman empire would be restored at the end of time by the Franks, not the Greeks, and that a Frankish ruler would deposit his crown and scepter on Mount Olives, bringing "an end and consummation to the Roman and Christian empire." Liudprand of Cremona, Relatio de legatione Constantinopolitana, ed. P. Chiesa (Turnholt 1998) 204–206, commenting on apocalyptic commentaries he encountered in Constantinople (ca. 968), refutes a Greek prophecy that the "lion and the whelp" (the Byzantine emperor Nicephorus and the Franks) would destroy the "wild ass" (the Saracens). Liudprand asserts instead that the Western emperor Otto and his son would destroy the "wild ass" Nicephorus. Liudprand also proclaims that it was the Franks, not the Greeks, who were fated to destroy the Muslims.

⁴⁷To take one famous example, see Odo of Deuil, De profectione Ludovici VII in orientem, ed. and trans. V. Berry (New York 1948), who attributed the failure of the Second Crusade in part to the treachery of the "perfidious Greeks."

forces of the ultimate persecuting society, the followers of Antichrist.⁴⁸

The theme of the Greek Church's blindness, punishment, and redemption, glimpsed in the Liber de concordia, is fully articulated by Joachim in the Expositio in Apocalypsim through his exegesis of Revelation 11.2: "Then I was given a measuring rod like a staff, and I was told 'Come and measure the Temple of God and the altar and those who worship there, but do not measure the court outside of the temple; leave that out, for it is given over to the nations, and they will trample over the holy city for forty-two months.'"⁴⁹ The abbot associates the court, which is "joined to the structure of the Temple as if by a certain affinity or nearness, but nevertheless seems alien from the body of the Temple," with the Greek Church and clergy, which had been justly given over to the Gentiles after abandoning the living Temple of Rome and its teachings.⁵⁰ Nevertheless, Joachim qualifies, when the Lord gives the instruction to measure the altar in the Temple, this includes a remnant of the Greeks who remained faithful to Rome, like the seven thousand men of Israel that did not bend their knees to Baal.

To further explain how this remnant will follow the Latins into the spiritual faith, Joachim turns to the discovery of Christ's empty tomb by Mary Magdalene, followed by the entry of Peter and then John into the tomb, despite the fact that John had arrived there before Peter (John 20.1–18). Through the abbot's threefold exegetical lens, Mary signifies the Jews, Peter signifies the Latins, and John the Greeks, who were the first to learn the "surface of the letter," but failed up until the present to enter into its "internal understanding."⁵¹ Joachim further explains that the Latin Church and Peter are also a type for the Son, while the Greek Church and John are a type for the Holy Spirit: Why then, the abbot asks, do the Greeks not realize that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (a patre filioque), as taught by the Roman Church? Because they have basely received their instruction from the Jews, who recognize the ⁴⁸On Joachim's innovative views of Antichrist, see R. Lerner, "Antichrists and Antichrist in Joachim of Fiore," Speculum 60 (1985) 553–570.

⁴⁹*Expositio in Apocalypsim* (1527; Frankfurt 1964). Joachim began composition of the Expositio around the same time as the Liber de concordia (ca. 1183). A critical edition of this text is under preparation by K.-V. Selge. On the eschatological redemption of the Greeks and the Jews, lead by members of the Latin Church, cf. the Liber de concordia 137 (fol. 17v): "De Latinis autem non deesse poterunt relique post transmigrationem Babilonis—que sicut ostendetur postea presens est—in quibus operabitur Spiritus Sanctus opera sua usque ad consummationem seculi, vocatis per eos ad unitatem ecclesie non modo Greci—qui prope esse videntur—verum etiam Iudei, qui longe discesserunt a gratia."

⁵⁰*Expositio*, fol. 142v: "At quomodo atrium quod est foris Templum, ita quidem structure templi, ac si quadam affinitate seu propinquitate coniungitur, ut tamen a corpore templi alienum esse videatur. Sic Clerus Grecorum quadam propinquitate Christiane fidei iunctus esse videtur Clero Latinorum, et tamen quibusdam usibus superstitionis segregatus est ab Ecclesia Petri, nolens coarctari et constringit sub disciplina universalis Episcopi et Pastoris animarum suarum." On the Greek Church as the "court" and Rome as the "Temple," cf. the Liber de concordia 364 (fols. 49v–50r).

⁵¹*Expositio*, fol. 143v: "Inde est quod scient Maria designat Synagoga, ita Petrus populum Latinam, Ioannes Grecum, qui duo simul et audierunt libenter et cucurrunt velociter ad monumentum. Cucurrit autem citius Ioannes et pervenit ad ipsum nec tunc introiit, quia citius cucurrit et precucurrit Grecus ad discendam superficiem littere prioris testamenti et tunc ad internum ipsius intellectum usque ad hec nostra tempora non pervenit." This story is read Easter week of every year, Joachim notes, but most hear only the outer and not the inner meaning, understanding that Peter signifies the Christians and John the Jews, who came first to the tomb (i.e., the Old Testament) but failed to enter into its internal understanding. For this standard exegesis, see the Biblia sacra cum glosa interlineari ordinaria, ed. Nicholas de Lyra (Venice 1588) vol. 5, fol. 240v: "Ioannes significat Synagoga, quae prior venit ad monumentum sed non intravit, quia prophetias de incarnatione et passione audivit, sed et mortuum credere noluit. Petrus Ecclesia, quae cognovit carne mortuum, viventem credidit Deum, post quem et in Judea in fine intravit."

"mystery of God the Father," but have scorned to accept instruction from the Latins, the "similitude of the Son."⁵²

As Joachim would have been well aware, the filioque clause (the Latin amendment of the creed to read that the Holy Spirit proceeds not only from the Father but from the Father and the Son) was a long-standing point of contention between Rome and Constantinople.⁵³ Often, among modern historians, this doctrinal controversy is seen as precisely the sort of "timeless" (if not somewhat tiresome) dispute that slowly embittered the two churches until the crusades and other encounters brought them into open conflict during the eleventh and twelfth centuries. For the less charitable, the dispute is taken as a visible sign of just how hysterical both sides had become due to their underlying political antagonism and cultural alienation, ready to come to blows over a single phrase. The significance of the double procession in Joachim's model of history, however, related to his presentation of the Holy Spirit as the prime agent in the dawning third status, reveals a layer of significance to the filioque controversy that scholars of the schism have almost completely overlooked.⁵⁴ For the abbot, far from being an obscure point of doctrinal difference, the filioque manifested a historical divergence between the Latin and Greek Churches on par with the split between the church and the synagogue.

In his biography of Rupert of Deutz, John Van Engen comments on the rising interest of twelfth-century theologians toward the third person of the Trinity and notes that "apart from polemics on the filioque, Rupert's was in fact the first such separate treatment of the Holy Spirit in the West, and thus represented an important early witness to a new form of piety singling out the Spirit's work in Christian life, comparable to the new cult of Christ's humanity."⁵⁵ Among other implications, Rupert's interest in the Holy Spirit manifested itself in his emphasis on the agency of the Holy Spirit in the period after the Incarnation, loosely matching the agency of the Father in the Old Testament and that of the Son in the New Testament. Historians often see this alignment of the Holy Spirit with the era of post-biblical salvation, also shared by Rupert's devotee, Gerhoh of Reichersberg, as a precedent for Joachim's model of the third status.⁵⁶ Hitherto unnoticed, all three Latin authors shared another point in common that was integral to their theologies of history: the doctrine of the Holy Spirit's double procession a patre filioque, in conscious distinction from the position of the Greek Church.

In the Liber de diviniis officiis and his massive De trinitate et operibus eius, Rupert

⁵²*Expositio*, fols. 143v–144r.

⁵³See R. Haugh, Photius and the Carolingians: the Trinitarian Controversy (Belmont, MA 1975).

⁵⁴See, however, E. R. Daniel, "The Double Procession of the Holy Spirit in Joachim of Fiore's Understanding of History," Speculum 55 (1980) 469–483. Daniel's article is exceptional in its appreciation of how the dual procession factors into Joachim's historical schemes, including the confrontation with the Greeks over filioque.

⁵⁵Van Engen, Rupert of Deutz (n. 28 above) 91.

⁵⁶On Gerhoh's career and theology of history, see P. Classen, Gerhoh von Reichersberg: Eine Biographie (Wiesbaden 1960); Classen, "Res Gestae" (n. 22 above) 409–411; and Beinert, Die Kirche-Gottes (n. 29 above) 331–333, who includes a chart of Gerhoh's historical schemes as they are presented in his Libellus de ordine donorum sancti spiritus, ed. D. Van den Eynde et al., in Gerhohi praepositi Reichersbergensis opera inedita (Rome 1955) 65–165 (selections in E. Sackur, ed., MGH LdL 3.273–283); and in his De quarta vigilia noctis, ed. E. Sackur, MGH LdL 3.503–525.

of Deutz unambiguously affirms the Roman doctrine the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son (filioque), continually visiting the world in "diverse times and diverse ways".⁵⁷ In another commentary on the Trinity, De glorificatione trinitatis et processione sancti spiritus, he briefly addresses the fact that the Greeks did not properly understand the nature of the Godhead, denying the Spirit's dual procession contrary to the wisdom of Rome, "pillar of the Latin Churches," as well as the teachings of ancient Greek fathers like Athanasius.⁵⁸ Less reticent than Rupert, in the second book of De investigatione Antichristi Gerhoh of Reichersberg devoted considerable attention to refuting various heresies against the Godhead, including the Greek denial that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and Son.⁵⁹ Gerhoh implies that the Latin confrontation with "modern Greeks" (moderni Graeci) was part of the historical battle of the Roman Church against wrong-believers, sentiments he makes clear when reviewing the argument of the second book that had progressed from "the fall of the Tower of Babylon, in which heretical perversity exhaled the primordial audacity, to a brief disputation against the heresies of our time, those slandering both the divine nature and glory of Christ, together with the error of the Greeks, who obversely deny that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son."⁶⁰

More so than either Rupert or Gerhoh, Joachim placed the ongoing activity of the Holy Spirit, understood as proceeding from both the Father and Son, at the forefront of his exegesis and eschatology. In his commentary on Revelation 11.1–2, the providential significance of the filioque controversy is brought plainly into light: Filioque demonstrated how the Greeks, like John at Christ's tomb, had hesitated to enter into the inner mysteries of the faith, despite the fact that they had received the word of God before the Latins. The abbot is explicit that the Greek rejection of Rome's teaching that the Holy Spirit comes also from the Son was tantamount to the Jewish rejection of the fact that Christ the Son came from the Father.⁶¹ In these terms, the double procession of the Holy Spirit resonated with an historical and eschatological significance that is lost when the controversy is treated as mere window-dressing for the political and ecclesiological conflicts of Byzantium and the West. For Joachim, the divergence over ⁵⁷See, for example, Rupert of Deutz, De divinis officiis (n. 28 above) 342–343; and De sancta Trinitate et operibus eius, ed. H. Haacke, CCCM 21, 22, 24 (Turnhout 1971–1972) 1826. On Rupert's Trinitarian theology, see also the comments of W. Cizewski, "A Theological Feast: the Commentary by Rupert of Deutz on Trinity Sunday," Recherches de Théologie Ancienne et Médiévale 55 (1988) 41–52.

⁵⁸*De glorificatione trinitatis et processione sancti spiritus*, PL 169.29C.

⁵⁹Gerhoh of Reichersberg, Libri III de investigatione Antichristi, unacum tractatu adversus Graecos, ed. F. Scheibelberger, in Gerhohi Reicherbergensis praepositi opera hactenus inedita, vol. 1 (Linz 1875); book one is edited by E. Sachur, De investigatione Antichristi liber I, MGH LdL 3.304–395. In book two, after presenting the triune divisions of history, the judgments of the Trinity against sinners, and various heresies against the Godhead, Gerhoh, De investigatione Antichristi, ed. Scheibelberger, 343–357, presents a fictive dialogue between a Latinus and Graecus over the filioque clause and other divisions between the two churches.

⁶⁰*De investigatione Antichristi*, ed. Scheibelberger (n. 59 above) 362: "Deinde occasione turris babylonicae, in qua primordiale haeretica pravitas spirabat audaciam, aliquantisper contra nostri temporis haereses Christi divinae naturae simul et gloriae detrahentes disputatum est, simul et Graecorum errori, quo Spiritum sanctum a Filio procedere negant obviatum."

⁶¹*Expositio*, fol. 142v: "Magis autem dicenda est sancta Civitas, sancta Romana ecclesia que firmiter tenet et predicat veram fidem, non sicut Ecclesia Graecorum, que negat spiritum sanctum procedere a filio Dei; nec sicut Synagoga Iudeorum, que negat Messiam, id est, Christum natum a Deo patre, quasi non sit filius Dei sed filius Ioseph, qui causa magni mysterii dictus est vir Marie."

the filioque was another key to unlocking the providential mystery of Christendom's division.

It was also the key that would open the door to the churches' eventual reunion. In the Gospel story of the two disciples at Christ's empty sepulcher, after all, John does at last enter into the tomb. So too, according to the Expositio in Apocalypsim, the Greeks will ultimately join the Latins in the spiritual understanding. After the Greeks realize that "the letter is death," Joachim declares, "there shall be converted wholeheartedly the remnant from among them and they shall come to Zion seeking David its master and king. And they will worship at the altar which is founded at Rome. And the hand of the Lord will be upon them."⁶² All these events would be in accordance with God's instructions in the Apocalypse to measure the altar within the Temple, a task that would be carried out by a group of spiritual men emerging from within the order of monks (ordo monachorum). Joachim generally associates this order with the Holy Spirit and the third status, corresponding to the laity (ordo coniugatorum) in the first status of the Father and the clergy (ordo clericorum) in the second status of the Son. Historically, this third order of monks had emerged from a dual origin with the prophets Elijah and Elisha in the temporum of the Father and with Saint Benedict of Nursia in the temporum of the Son, like the Holy Spirit itself that proceeds from the both Father and the Son (a patre filioque procedit).⁶³

In a stroke of providential irony, the Greeks, who failed to understand the doctrine of filioque, would ultimately be saved by an order of monks that itself proceeded from the status of both the Father and the Son (filioque).⁶⁴ In the course of the abbot's general exegesis, the Old Testament origin of monastic life with the prophets of Israel ties into his concordance of Israel and Juda with the Greek and Latin Churches: Just as Elijah and Elisha rebuked the kings of Israel and remained steadfast to the sons of David, so there were a number of Greek monks who decried the Arian heretics of their own church and remained loyal to Rome.⁶⁵ When the Arian barbarians invaded Italy at the bidding of the Eastern emperors, Saint Benedict arose as a “mediator” between the Greek and Latin monastic traditions.⁶⁶ Ultimately, Joachim asserts, when the Saracens conquered the Eastern Church and Greek imperium was transferred to the Franks, the corresponding translatio religionis from the East to the West was complete. As explained in the Expositio in Apocalypsim, monasticism had been transferred to the Latins, “where, remaining among them for a while, it will be baptized by the Holy Spirit so that it might live in Christ, and will return to that people from which it came to us, remaining among that same people up until the end.”⁶⁷

⁶²*Expositio*, fol. 144r: "Greci nesciunt mortuam esse litteram, ubi spiritus vivit. Sciunt autem postea. Sciunt inquam scient et conuertentur ex eis relique in toto corde suo et venient in Syon querentes dominum et David regem suum. Et adorabunt in altari quod fundamentum est Rome. Et tunc manus domini erit cum eis." According to the book of John, Joachim continues, Mary Magdalene later saw Christ outside the tomb, foreshadowing that a remnant of the Jews will also turn to the Lord (Expositio, fol. 144v: "Et relique Iudeorum pari modo conuertentur ad dominum, secundum quod de duobus cecis in typō utriusque populi in evangelio scriptum est"). His subsequent exegesis on the Gospel story of the blind men, Expositio, fols. 144v–145r, affirms his belief that both the Greeks and the Jews will ultimately be saved. In the book of Luke, Christ heals a blind man on the road to Jericho, before awakening the tax collector Zachea from his "blindness of mind" within the city, pertaining to the conversion of a remnant of the Greeks (the blind man) and the Jews (Zachea) before the time of Antichrist. The book Matthew relates that Christ healed two blind men on the road from Jericho, pertaining to the time after the tribulations of the Antichrist, in reference to the "fullness of the Greeks and the Hebrews, among whom the spiritual understanding will fully arrive at last." Cf. the Biblia sacra cum glosa ordinaria, ed. Nicholas de Lyra, vol. 5, fol. 63v, for the standard exegesis of the blind men as a type for the Jews and Gentiles: "Veniens Jericho unum illuminat quod Lucas ait quia morti propinquans lumen evangelii praeedicavit Judeis, exiens duos, quia post resurrectionem Judaeis et gentibus."

⁶³*Liber de concordia* 72–73 (fol. 9r).

⁶⁴Daniel, "Double Procession" (n. 54 above) 474, perceptively notes that "for Joachim, historical fact confirmed the Latin position on the filioque against the Greeks. He accepted the double initiation of the monastic order. This could only be possible if the Holy Spirit proceeded from both the Father and the Son." However, Daniel stops short of connecting this insight to the work of other Latin historians or to Joachim's own concordance of Israel and Juda with the Greek and Latin Churches, nor does Daniel explore the implications of filioque for the abbot's view of the eschatological relationship between the two churches.

Joachim elaborated on this future return of the monastic ordo and the Holy Spirit to the Greeks in his final work, the Tractatus super quattuor Evangelia, incomplete when he died in the year 1202.⁶⁸ Revisiting his basic concordance of Israel and Juda with the Greeks and Latins, the abbot increasingly emphasizes the misdeeds of Constantinople itself, rather than the Greeks as a whole: Like Samaria, he notes, the capital of Israel that unjustly dominated Galilee, the church of Constantinople held sway over the churches of the Greeks “not by right but by tyranny.”⁶⁹ Constantinople, however, would play a key role in the dissemination of the spiritual intelligence to the Eastern Church, as indicated in the story of Christ’s passage through Samaria and meeting with the Samaritan woman at Jacob’s well (John 4.1–45). Jesus rested by the well around noon, the sixth hour, Joachim explains, signifying the opening of the sixth seal of the Apocalypse. The “water of life” Christ offers to the Samaritan woman signifies the teachings that the spiritual men of the monastic order will offer to the Eastern Church through Constantinople, which had been cut off from Latin mystical doctrine (mistica doctrina) since the invasion of the Saracens. This conversion of a portion of the Greeks would come before the opening of the seventh seal and the full restoration not just of the Eastern Church, but the also of the Jews to the unity of the faith:

The two days that Christ remained in the city of Samaria before he returned to Galilee designate the time of the Greek return to the unity of the Roman Church, from which they are removed through many schisms, preceding the arrival of Jewish people into the

⁶⁵*Liber de concordia* 136 (fol. 17v): “ut in populo illo clarverunt Elias et Eliseus et filii prophetarum, execrantes errores regum Israel et adherentes potius filiis David, ita inventi sunt in populo Grecorum magni heremite et abbates, habentes plures discipulos in monastica perfectione, qui etiam pro fide catholica in qua pie sentiebant cum Romanis, multa a Grecorum hereticis graviaque discrimina passi sunt.” Cf. the Liber de concordia 72–73 (fol. 9r): “Et nichilominus de ecclesia universali, que comissa est Petro, processit quodammodo ecclesia Grecorum in qua invente sunt reliquie in diebus suis et magni patres conversantes in deserto similes Elie et Elisei et filiorum prophetarum commorantium in Jericho.”

⁶⁶*Liber de concordia* 351 (fol. 48r): “Hec idcirco dico, ut perpendat lector ita fuisse Eliseum quasi mediatorem inter tribum Iuda et tribum Israel, quomodo Benedictus per observationem monastice professionis—que propagata est a perfectis patribus Grecorum—effectus est mediator inter Grecos monachos et Latinos, tenens firmiter fidem Petri et sequens vitam piorum monachorum, qui claverunt apud illos et regulam sancti patris Basilii.”

⁶⁷*Expositio*, fol. 145r: “Nec ob aliam causam id factum, reor, quam ut intelligamus monachorum ordinem quem designat Iohannes a Grecis pervenisse ad Latinos, qui tunc ubi manens aliquandiu apud eos, baptizabitur Spiritu Sancto ut vivat in Christo; revertetur ad eum populum de quo venit ad nos, permansurus in eodem populo usque in finem.”

⁶⁸*Tractatus super quattuor Evangelia*, ed. E. Buonaiuti (Rome 1930).

⁶⁹*Quattuor evangelia* (n. 68 above) 278: “ut enim sub veteri Testamento Samaria erat caput Israel, sub quo continebatur et Galilea, ita sub novo, Constantinopolitana ecclesia erecta est, non iure, set tyrannide, ecclesiarum Grecorum.”

faith...therefore, the fact that Jesus remained for two days in a city of Samaria and afterward went into Galilee, signifies that the spiritual intelligence will arrive among the Greeks in the designated time of the sixth hour, and in the time designated by the seventh hour (spoken of in its own place), that same grace of the Savior will arrive in the Eastern Church, and in the unyielding and unbelieving synagogue of the Jews.⁷⁰

If Joachim's irenic vision of an eschatological Jewish union with the church reminds us that not all Christian Europeans felt the same about the Jews, as suggested by Robert Lerner, the abbot's presentation of an apocalyptic Greek reunion with the Latin Church must equally give us pause before assuming that intolerance and antagonism were the normative Latin attitudes toward members of the Greek Church. The abbot did not consign the Greeks to some state of absolute alterity, lumped together with Jews, heretics and other "others" as an undifferentiated threat to the Western Christian community. As the abbot notes during his exegesis of Revelation 11.1–2, although the court of the Greek Church was alien to the temple of Rome, it was also joined to it by a certain "affinity or propinquity" making the Greeks (to borrow Paul Freedman's phrase) "proximate others," with all of the ambiguity this concept implies.⁷¹ The historical fate of both Christian peoples was distinct yet inextricably linked, not only to that of each other but also to that of other identifiable groups within the meta-narrative of salvation history: Jews, Arian heretics, and Muslims. This network of relationships did not consist of a single righteous community surrounded by enemies. Rather, Jews, Greeks, and Latins stood in a sort of spiritual hierarchy, threatened from within and without by infidels, heretics and other minions of evil.⁷²

Joachim's representation of the monastic ordo as a point of mediation between the Latins and the Greeks seems particularly ill-suited to modern arguments that the twelfth century was a period of straightforward alienation from the Greek Church among members of the Western ecclesiastical elite. A monastic reformer himself, the abbot's concern with the dynamics of providential history and the purpose of the monastic tradition stands him squarely among his Latin contemporaries.⁷³ The well

⁷⁰*Quattor evangelia* (n. 68 above) 300: "Sane, duo dies quibus stetit Ihesus in civitate samarie antequam reverteretur in Galileam, designant tempus reversionis Grecorum ad Romane Ecclesie unitatem, a qua per multa scismata elongata est, antequam perveniat ad fidem populus Iudeorum...quod igitur Ihesus duos dies mansit in civitate Samarie et postea in Galileam, designat pervenire spiritualem intellectum ad Grecos, tempore quod designatum est in sexta hora et tempore quod designatum in septima, de qua in suo loco dicitur, pervenire eandem gratiam Salvatoris ad Orientalem ecclesiam, ad duram actenus et incredulam synagogam Iudeorum." For additional passages on the Greeks and the Jews, see the Quattor evangelia 12–13, 129–132, 176–184 and 219–222.

⁷¹P. Freedman, Images of the Medieval Peasant (Stanford 1999) 302. As Freedman, ibid., comments: "the dominant culture of any society does not simply classify with confidence or consistency those whom it regards as different. There are some 'differences' that it must deal with. It can do this by a compulsive proliferation of negative stereotypes. In that very proliferation, however, the internal consistency of vision and purpose is strained, and its complexity contains within it its own contestation."

⁷²This relationship is made visible in one of Joachim's figurae, the so-called "Three with Side-Shoots," which shows the Jews and Greeks as unfruitful shoots giving way to the Latins (further subdivided into the Cluniac and Cistercian orders). Muslims and heretics are nowhere in sight. See B. McGinn, "Alter Moyses: the Role of Bernard of Clairveaux in the Thought of Joachim of Fiore," Apocalypticism in the Western Tradition (Brookfield, VT 1994) 11.429–448; and M. Reeves and B. Hirsche-Reich, The Figurae of Joachim of Fiore (Oxford 1972) 174–183.

⁷³S. Wesley, Joachim of Fiore and Monastic Reform (New York 1990), examines the abbot's activities as a monastic reformer and their intersections with his historical schemes.

known proliferation of religious orders during this period—a source of inspiration for some clergymen and anxiety for others—encouraged numerous ecclesiastical authors beside the Calabrian abbot to explore the historical significance of monasticism in creative and sometimes polemical ways.⁷⁴ The idea that monastic life was transferred from the East to the West, for example, was not particular to Joachim's work.⁷⁵ Nor was the belief that monasticism had historically evolved to fulfill certain roles within the church, including those of an apocalyptic nature.⁷⁶ Yet these concepts assumed a unique resonance in the abbot's schemes. For Joachim, the historical development of religious life became the prism through which he viewed not just the development of various orders within the Roman Church, but also the division of Christendom into two religious communities—the ecclesia occidentalis and the ecclesia orientalis—that would be rejoined at the end of time.⁷⁷

Nor, for that matter, was Joachim's view of the Latin Church one of unalloyed celebration. In the past Rome and its followers had been defiled at the hands of Arian barbarians and afflicted by the Saracen conquests of Africa, Sicily, and Spain, even if they were not "absorbed" like the Greeks. Ultimately, the abbot's concordance of the Latin Church with Juda brought with it inescapable, apocalyptic consequences, since Juda itself was conquered and carried into captivity at Babylon, corresponding to the tribulations which the Roman Church would face at the hands of secular rulers, scandalous prelates, and dissolute clergy. We must never forget that Joachim believed he was living in the final days and that the restoration of the Lord's Temple would come only after the Western Church itself faced the forces of Antichrist. In this sense, his view of the Latin religious community and its priority over the Greeks would not be an easy tool to wield for those who were seeking simply to elevate their own power or to denigrate an alternative Christian tradition.

However, the abbot's theology of history was employed by a figure of considerable authority to make sense out of the relationship between Latins and Greeks during a moment of crisis between the two churches. In November 1204, roughly seven months

⁷⁴On twelfth-century monastic reform and debate, see J. Van Engen, "The Crisis of Cenobitism Reconsidered: Benedictine Monasticism," Speculum 61 (1982) 269–304; G. Constable, The Reformation of the Twelfth Century (Cambridge 1996); and C. Holdsworth, "The Past and Monastic Debate in the Time of Bernard of Clairvaux," Studies in Church History 33 (1997) 91–114.

⁷⁵Cf. Otto of Freising, Chronica sive historia de duabus civitatibus, ed. A. Hofmeister (Hannover 1912) 372: "Manent autem, sicut olim in Egypti, sic nunc in Galliae Germaniaeque partibus habundantibus, ut in hoc haut mireris potentiae seu sapientiae ab oriente ad occidentem translationem, cum de religione itidem factum eniteat."

⁷⁶This was a concept expressed with particular clarity by Anselm of Havelberg (d. 1158) in the first book of his Antikeimenon or Dialogi, PL 188.1139–1248. In this work, published separately with French translation in Anselme de Havelberg: Dialogues, Livre 1, ed. and trans. G. Salet (Paris 1966), Anselm appealed to a dynamic vision of universal history to apologize for the variety of religious orders appearing in the Western Church, before discussing points of divisions between the Latins and Greeks in the second and third books. The ostensible reason for his composition of the text was a papal request for an account of his disputations with the Greek archbishop of Nicomedia at Constantinople in 1136. See the important analysis of this text as a whole by J. T. Lees, Anselm of Havelberg: Deeds into Words in the Twelfth Century (Leiden 1998). Anselm's theology of history has been compared with that of Joachim (e.g., Constable, Reformation [n. 74 above] 166–167) without noting their shared interest in Latin and Greek difference.

⁷⁷Regarding the importance of groups and orders for twelfth-century ecclesiastical thinkers, see C. W. Bynum, "Did the Twelfth Century Discover the Individual?" in Jesus as Mother: Studies in the Spirituality of the High Middle Ages (Berkeley 1982) 82–109.

after the errant Fourth Crusade captured Constantinople, Pope Innocent III (d. 1216) addressed the Roman clergy remaining in the city in a letter which described the triumph as the handiwork of the Lord, who had “transferred the empire of Constantinople from the proud to the humble, from the disobedient to the obedient, from schismatics to Catholics, namely from the Greeks to the Latins.”⁷⁸ The epistle offered his commentary on the discovery of Christ’s empty tomb by Mary Magdalene, representing the Synagogue, who hastened to tell Peter and John, representing the Latin and Greek peoples, respectively. The disciples rushed to the tomb, and although John reached it before him, Peter was first to enter. According to Innocent, this Gospel story symbolized that although the Greeks had received the scriptures from the Jews before the Latins, it was the Latin people who had entered into the inner mysteries of the Old Testament and the Godhead, including the realization that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son. The time seemed at hand, however, for the Greeks to receive instruction from the Latins, joining them in the harmony of the faith. In these terms, Innocent concluded, recent events at Constantinople were clearly part of “an exalted plan” leading to the reunion of the two churches and ultimate salvation of all Israel.⁷⁹

In the course of this commentary, Innocent borrowed verbatim two substantial passages from Joachim of Fiore’s Expositio in Apocalypsim, which provided an unmistakable foundation for the pope’s exegesis.⁸⁰ The use of Joachite apocalypticism by this advocate of the papal monarchy to interpret the events of 1204 is striking. Latin aggression against the Eastern Roman Empire, including the sack of the Byzantine capital, is often employed as a yardstick for measuring the ascendancy of the medieval West: Richard Southern, for example, chose 1204 as a terminus for his classic The Making of the Middle Ages because the conquest of Constantinople marked the “restoration of the Mediterranean into European politics.”⁸¹ No other event looms quite so large in the history of the ecclesiastical schism between the two Christian peoples and few others can match its symbolic importance for the rise of medieval Latin Europe. Far from being the isolated speculation of a particularly creative but exceptional thinker, the schemes of the Calabrian suddenly emerge at the heart of an event frequently associated with the “making of Europe.”

In his book examining that very process, Robert Bartlett defines the nascent Latin Christendom of the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries as “a rite and an obedience,” specifically a growing adherence to the Roman liturgy and to the authority of Rome, as opposed in part to the liturgy and authority of Constantinople.⁸² He furthermore asserts that the development of this “new institutional and cultural uniformity in ⁷⁸Reg. 7.154, Die Register Innocenz’ III, ed. O. Hageneder et al. (Graz-Cologne 1964–) 264. Translation and commentary in A. Andrea, Contemporary Sources for the Fourth Crusade (Leiden 2001) 115–126.

⁷⁹By the summer of 1205, Innocent’s enthusiasm was being tempered by reports of Latin misdeeds in Constantinople. See Andrea, Fourth Crusade (n. 78 above) 162–168.

⁸⁰On Innocent’s knowledge of the Expositio, see C. Egger, “Papst Innocenz III. als Theologe: Beiträge zur Kenntnis seines Denkens im Rahmen der Frühscholastik,” Archivum Historiae Pontificiae 30 (1992) 55–123; and F. Robb, “Did Innocent III Personally Condemn Joachim of Fiore?” Florentia 7 (1993) 77–91.

⁸¹R. Southern, The Making of the Middle Ages (London 1953) 13.

⁸²Bartlett, Making of Europe (n. 6 above) 243: “the definition of Latin Christendom advanced in the opening chapter of this book was twofold: Latin Christendom was a rite and an obedience. ... The obedience the Western Church" was accompanied by "the strengthening of something less easily defined or dated, namely an identity." That identity itself, Bartlett stresses, was particularly Western or Latin in nature, as violently opposed to that of the Greeks.⁸³ Bartlett is not alone in seeing a new sense of Latin identity that developed during the period ca. 1050–1250. Collin Morris, for example, has expressed similar sentiments about the Western creation of an international culture "which increasingly bound together the divers, often hostile, peoples into one Christian people," but which also had "a fragmenting as well as unifying impact, for it stamped new divisions upon society, between clergy and laity, Latins and Greeks, and papacy and empire."⁸⁴

Joachim's presentation of Christendom's division gives us one vivid example of how those new divisions were "stamped" upon Latins and Greeks, and reminds us that this process was not always one of unadulterated violence—not even during a moment of conflict as apparently unambiguous as the sack of Constantinople, when one of the most powerful figures in Europe turned to the abbot's exegesis to make sense out of that unexpected event. Judging by his writings, the abbot did not hate the Greeks, even if he understood that they had ceded their place of primacy in God's dispensation to the Latins. He was not a xenophobic crusader nor was he suddenly thrust into contact with Greek Christians by the medieval expansion of Europe, although he did live on a frontier of sorts between the Latin West and Greek East. As a resident of Calabria and traveler in the Mediterranean world, Joachim would have been exposed to Greek Christianity his entire life.⁸⁵ He was, however, a product of his times in the sense that he participated in the rapidly changing ecclesiastical culture of the twelfth-century Roman Church, when the authority of the past, the relationship of secular power to priestly authority, and the very ordering of Christian society were in a fertile state of dislocation.⁸⁶

According to historians of medieval anti-Judaism, the period in question was also one of renewed speculation about the relationship between the church and the synagogue, encouraged by the ideology of the contemporary reform movement, whose advocates aimed to draw a keener sense of who was inside of Christendom's walls and who was outside of them.⁸⁷ The related question of how reform-era Latin thinkers in question, and the liturgical standard, was, of course, Roman."

⁸³Bartlett, Making of Europe (n. 6 above) 250. See also Bartlett, 254: "the Christendom that became newly aware of itself in the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries was not the Christendom of Constantine, but an assertively western or Latin Christendom."

⁸⁴C. Morris, The Papal Monarchy: The Western Church from 1050–1250 (Oxford 1989) 3–4. Emphasis added.

⁸⁵On the presence of Greek Christians in Joachim's homeland, see the brief comments by Reeves, Joachim of Fiore (n. 17 above) 2, 11; and McGinn, Calabrian Abbot (n. 17 above) 33.

⁸⁶See, among others, G. Tellenbach, Libertas: Kirche und Weltordnung im Zeitalter des Investiturstreites (Stuttgart 1936); trans. R. F. Bennett, Church, State and Christian Society at the Time of the Investiture Contest (Oxford 1948); B. Smalley, The Becket Conflict and the Schools: A Study of Intellectuals in Politics (Totowa, NJ 1973); and I. S. Robinson, Authority and Resistance in the Investiture Contest (Manchester, UK 1978).

⁸⁷See A. Abulafia, "St Anselm and Those Outside the Church" in D. Loades and K. Walsh, eds., Faith and Identity: Christian Political Experience (Oxford 1990) 11–38; A. Abulafia, "The Ideology of Reform and Changing Ideas concerning Jews in the Works of Rupert of Deutz and Hermannus Quondam Iudeus," Jewish History 7 (1993) 43–63; and D. Timmer, "Biblical Exegesis and the Jewish-Christian Controversy in the Early Twelfth Century," Church History 58 (1989) 309–321.

reconfigured the lines between the Western and Eastern Churches has slipped somewhere between the cracks, skewed by the persistence of blaming one factor or another (if not one side or another) for the division of Christian. Joachim also reminds us that medieval observers themselves had their own interpretative schemes at hand to make sense out of that development. The abbot, for one, arrived at his own understanding of Latin and Greek difference by working within the same framework of exegesis which Christians thinkers had employed to establish the identity of the orthodox church vis-à-vis the synagogue and heretical groups, namely, by reading progression of God's dispensation through the unity of the Old and New Testaments.⁸⁸

For Joachim and a number of his devotees, Latin Christendom consisted of more than the cultural uniformity provided by the Roman Church through its rituals, dogma and networks of communication: Latin Christians were members of a sacred community intended by the Lord for the ultimate salvation of the Eastern Church, as well as the synagogue.⁸⁹ In 1204, at least, such a sophisticated representation of the Latin Christian community lay close the halls of power, as revealed by Innocent's use of Joachite exegesis. Was this a comfort for those in Constantinople being plundered, raped and killed? One must assume that it was not. It would be irresponsible to deny the naked aggression of some Latin Europeans toward their non-Christian and non-Latin neighbors. In a way, the cries of blood-thirsty crusaders heedlessly sacking Byzantium are less demanding on the ear than the educated voices that could interpret that violent event as the handiwork of God. Yet those voices existed and they point us toward a better understanding of the premodern form of identity expressed in the concept of Latin Christendom. If it is truly the case that Latin Christendom was a premodern form of Europe, as many scholars seem to feel, then such historical frameworks both privileging and limiting the providential destiny of the Western religious community cannot be lightly ignored. As Pope John Paul II's visit to Greece in May 2001 reminds us, when the aging pontiff apologized for past Catholic aggressions against the Orthodox Church including the Fourth Crusade, the division of Christendom itself is far from a settled affair.

History Department
Stanford University
Stanford, CA 94305-2024

⁸⁸On biblical hermeneutics and the development of anti-Judaism in the patristic period, see M. Taylor, Anti-Judaism and Early Christian Identity: A Critique of the Scholarly Consensus (Leiden 1995); and P. Fredriksen, "Excaecati Occulta Justitia Dei: Augustine on Jews and Judaism," Christianity in Relation to Jews, Greeks and Romans (New York 1999) 37-62; as well as P. Fredriksen, "Secundem Carnem: History and Israel in the Theology of St Augustine" in W. Klinghirm and M. Vessey, eds., The Limits of Ancient Christianity (Ann Arbor 1999) 26-41. See also the criticism of Taylor by G. Stroumsa, "From Anti-Judaism to Antisemitism in Early Christianity" in Contra Iudaeos, ed. O. Limor and G. Stroumsa (Tübingen 1996) 15-17.

⁸⁹I am currently working on an expanded investigation of this topic that will explore how Joachim's representation of Christendom's division influenced subsequent thinkers, including Saint Bonaventure, Peter John Olivi and the Ps.-Joachite author(s) of the Super Jeremiam.